General Comment

Regarding the controversy surrounding the contraceptive issue: Why not simply require any health plan that covers the cost of Viagra (or any drug/operation that enables or enhances sexual capability or performance in men) also be required to cover the cost of pregnancy prevention medication/surgery in women?

Simple and fair.

Of course the real issue is about Abortion, the "Morning After" pill and the current scientific definition of pregnancy (beginning after a fertilized egg attaches itself to the placenta) vs the religious definition (a POTENTIAL fertilized egg based on the fact a male ejaculated in the vicinity of a female).

Obama wants to tax my already taxed long-term capital gains at a higher rate? FINE as long as he taxes the tax-free religious organizations that enter the political arena and want to jam their social values down my throat. So let any religious organization that is willing to give up their tax-free status have an exemption. That's fair too.

Now watch all the tax-exempt religions that include Viagra in their medical plans scream that their religious rights would be violated.
