General Comment

All parts of health care laws and health care regulations must support life. No one gives life to himself/herself; no one, therefore, should take this life away under any circumstance.

All parts of health care laws and health care regulations must allow for conscientious objections based on valid religious beliefs. The United States was formed to protect, among other things, religious freedom. The federal government should not infringe upon true religious beliefs in laws or regulations which force people to pay for or participate in objectionable practices.
