Hi my name is [redacted], and I have been a hard working taxpayer for most of my life. I think the SEC really needs to take into account the everyday person's opinions of how to spend the "taxpayers" money. I feel it is not only a great idea but it is our civic duty to start persecuting financial criminals. People that are running funds on behalf of anyone should be held to the utmost highest regard. What happened in 2008 has rippled in effect, and still to this day not one single person has been convicted of these misdoings. It would be a travesty to allow this to happen again. The crimes that are occurring in broad daylight have the most vial of implications. Spoofing cancer companies, shelving innovation in a sector there should be ZERO resistance in, cancer research. People of All shapes and sizes are effected everyday by these vile villains, of finance. Wallstreet has been a land without laws for too long, so we have to include punishments in our future laws. There's no reason to trust the financial system, and for there ever to be a reason to trust in American finance again it will be after people are held liable for their actions and that moving forward anyone who wants to play around with other peoples money, there needs to be penalties that are actually devastating just like the effects their actions have had on the economy. Jail time is a must, criminals must be prosecuted. Wall Street is not supposed to be a free for all of the super elites. This must stop here.
