The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Larry Sneed
Oakland, CA
larry.sneed.sm64@statefarm.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Larry Patrick
Fort Walton Beach, FL
larry.patrick.bxd8@statefarm.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Gustavo Machicado
Albuquerque, NM
gmachicado5@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Simon ter Avest
Battle Creek, MI
simon@jtaagency.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Brett Ruddell
Fort Worth, TX
brett@ruddellfinancial.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Krista Kecskemety
Lyndhurst, OH
bill.insurance@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Holden Foster
Fort Worth, TX
the_squirts91@yahoo.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Diane Hamm
Eaastlake, OH
david.insurance@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Arnie Kroupa
Towanda, KS
arnie.kroupa@axa-advisors.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Clayton Agena
Honolulu, HI
ceagen@aol.com

07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

David Jacowitz
Pittsford, NY
djacowitz@financialguide.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Robert Pedersen
Rio Vista, CA
rob@pedins.com

07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Joey Ussery
Sealy, TX
joey_ussery@jhancock.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Brian Kelly
St Louis Park, MN
brian.kelly@nm.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, so that income can be created via systematic withdrawals or a lifetime income annuity.

I have personally worked with a number of clients who called their 401k provider for a partial withdrawal to create income, only to be told withdrawals are all or nothing. Good decision making is key in this situation to manage taxes and make sure income lasts a lifetime.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

We need to make sure resources are available to the client without scaring them away before the process begins.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

patria alvarez
new orleans, LA
alvarez.patria.aa@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

John Forbing
pomona, CA
john.forbing.btug@statefarm.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Recently, I helped Frank decide what to do with his 401(k) account when he terminated employment. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for him. I helped him decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet his risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds and an annuity. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Frank would instead just cash out his 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if he hadn't had access to my services. This is very simple and I just follow the rules.

Thomas Sokoloski
South Glastonbury, CT
tjsoko@aol.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Russell Porter
Lafayette, CO
russ@russporterinsurance.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Steve Leslie
Seneca, SC
hsleslie@bellsouth.net
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Anthony Izzo
Melville, NY
tonyizzo@erols.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Helen McDonnell
Las Vegas, NV
hmcdonnell@metlife.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Ryan Tyler
Cochranville, PA
ryan.tyler.qwmd@statefarm.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Christopher Fide
Fresno, CA
fide.chris@principal.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

thomas harrington
Manassas, VA
thomas.harrington@kofc.org
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The effect of this seems to be to protect the fee-based advisor to the detriment of the client who would lose because the fee-based model doesn't fit their need. This will serve to reduce the savings of many, making them less self-reliant in saving for retirement. The unintended consequences are a real concern. Here's more detail:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Robert Porter
Wilmington, DE
bob@riskfreeretirementplanners.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Victoria Fink
Dyersville, IA
vickifink@iowatelecom.net

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

William Altman
Chestnut Hill, MA
william_altman@wellesleyfinancialgroup.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Paul LaRou
Amherst, NY
plarou@glic.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Logan McConathy
Minden, LA
logan.mcconathy.ujlv@statefarm.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Douglas Motz
Palm Desert, CA
dougmotz@yahoo.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Albert Ornelas
San Antonio, TX
alberto.ornelas@mwarep.org
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

John Clearman
Sumrall, MS
jtclearman@megagate.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Mark Fairman
North Bergen, NJ
mfairman@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Scott Warshaw
Bala Cynwyd, PA
swarshaw@financialguide.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Meena Chib
Scotch Plains, NJ
mchib@ft.newyorklife.com

07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Rick Villarreal
Round Rock, TX
rick_villarreal@sbcglobal.net
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure. I have worked with many individuals who would have never started a retirement plan or saving for their future goals if I had not introduced them to the opportunity to do so. Some of these people have started with as little as $50.00 per month.

I have been able to provide this service under the current and past rules and guidelines that allowed me to sell these kinds of products to them at no cost to them other than those costs related to products. The new guidelines drafted are too restrictive to allow me to do the same as referred to below.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. The licensing, compliance measures and continuing education requirements are difficult now that limited the number of advisors available to provide affordable solutions for the consumer. These measures as drafted would provide the consumers even less opportunities to start meeting their savings goals.

Lindsay Haas
New Braunfels, TX
lindsayh@hoffmannfinancial.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Martha Frantz
Fresno, CA
frantz.martha@principal.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Chris Foster
Greensboro, NC
lgfoster@financialguide.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

David Bonomi
W Springfield, MA
david.bonomi@nm.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Stephen Kastrul
Denver, CO
stephen_kastrul@cinfin.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned with current proposal. It contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. This is not always the best value for my clients.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.
- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jonathan Mopper
Dunwoody, GA
jmmopper@aol.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

John Jacobs
Hudson, NY
john.e.jacobs@nm.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

John Abney
Odessa, TX
gene.abney@mutualofomaha.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Terry Buskirk
HOLDREGE, NE
terry.buskirk@securitiesamerica.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kevin Keller
charlotte, NC
kevin_keller@ohionational.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Efrain Rivera Junior Irving, TX
erivera02@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Karen Haigh
Yorba Linda, CA
khaigh@pacbell.net
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Perry McCreary
Roswell, NM
pmccreary@farmersagent.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Rolando Barrera
Corpus Christi, TX
roland@rbi96.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Paul Miller
Maquoketa, IA
pmiller@tfamail.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ronald Rodgers
Sammamish, WA
ceoron@nwlink.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Scott Gons
Findlay, OH
scottgons@financialguide.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

This bill will greatly limit my ability to help my clients with their request for help on their retirement accounts. Many do not understand, many do not want to be forced into a fee based situation. Many do not have an account size that would warrant a fee for service arrangement. Please do not limit or change what is working well at this time!

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Ian Harris
Columbia, MD
ian.harris@axa-advisors.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Please contact me directly by email or phone and I will happily speak regarding my own personal situation and provide anecdotal evidence of why this legislation must be revised prior to passage. I am new to the industry and am concerned for my and my family's well being. More importantly, I am disheartened by how drastically this could affect the clientele with which I work.

RAJESHVARI PALA
HOUSTON, TX
rajupala1@yahoo.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kevin Martin
Mount Vernon, IL
kevin.martin.micv@statefarm.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kevin Garry
Sioux Falls, SD
kevin@garryassociates.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

M. Durkin
Lake Grove, NY
matthewdurkin@financialguide.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jake Jacobson
Fort Worth, TX
jake@deanjacobson.com

07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Luke Finchem
Spring Lake, MI
lfinchem@ft.nl.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Michael Limas
Brownsville, TX
michael.limas@axa-advisors.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jarod Powell
Bettendorf, IA
jarod@powellfinancialgroup.net
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Maynard McQuiston
Bozeman, MT
maynard@fstwest.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Domenica Stuckey
Cary, NC
stuckey85si@hotmail.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Caleb Bouma
Moscow, ID
caleb.bouma@nm.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement - in many cases an inefficient arrangement for companies.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Lisa Harsch
Memphis, TN
lharsch@farmersagent.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Peirce Ward
Charlotte, NC
pward@financialguide.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

R. Patrick Blevins
Lexington, VA
patrick@patrickblevins.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Joni Reiling
Webster City, IA
joni.reiling@centralfinancialgroup.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Henry Williams
Marianna, FL
keith.williams.iy9t@statefarm.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Benjamin UySmith
Durham, NC
benjamin.uysmith@axa-advisors.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Martin Leinneweber
Dallas, TX
mleinneweber@ft.newyorklife.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Robert Routson
Broadview Hts, OH
rroutson@aol.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Denise Dombach
Mechanicsburg, PA
denise.dombach.qm5e@statefarm.com

07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Larry Goebel Fond du Lac, WI
larry@goebelins.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Haswell Franklin
Lutherville, MD
hfranklinjr@financialguide.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Surekha Puram
Edina, MN
surekha.puram@nm.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Amy Edgren
St Louis Park, MN
amy@woodhillfinancial.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Naresh Kumar Bali
Yuba City, CA
nareshkumarbali@yahoo.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Eric Herried
Duluth, MN
epherried@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Lisa Witham
New Castle, IN
lisa.witham@horacemann.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Matt Frye
Milton, PA
matt@mattfrye.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Sophia Karau
West Des Moines, IA
sophia.karau@axa-advisors.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Barry Johnson
Washington, IA
bjfs@netins.net

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

I reiterate my comments from before. In 30 years in the business, I have never seen anything like the government takeover of private business, as is described above in this letter.

Rick Hauser
Hankinson, ND
fouruins@midco.net
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Doug McMurry
Mesa, AZ
dmcmurryic@msn.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kim Varnadore
Eustis, FL
kim.varnadore.pbc7@statefarm.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jeremy Tyler, ChFC®
Springfield, MO
jtyler@myclearview.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Charles Gibson
Mt. Pleasant S.C., SC
c.f.gibson@att.net
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Penelope Hart
Seminole, FL
pphart@ft.newyorklife.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Blake Thomas
Ormond Beach, FL
blake@blakethomas.net
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

It doesn't take a rocket scientist to realize that this legislation is a bad thing. I have been serving my State Farm clients for 28 years and care deeply about the impact I have on them and our community. If you read the inner workings of this legislation you will see that it is not healthy and limits compensation for quality work (setting up and assisting on 401k's, writing IRA's for clients, and even using a normal portfolio model based on the person's risk model is turned against the advisor. I am very concerned and disappointed that this legislation has even gotten this far and will oppose it and anyone in favor of it. It goes far beyond reasonable... you are killing flies with a cannon.

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

In my opinion... this is BAD legislation that needs to be re-written and corrected before anything moves forward.

James Linenger
Brighton, MI
jim@financialarch.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Richard Pilat
Braintree, MA
rpilat@financialguide.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

CC: Sens. Markey, Warren and Rep. Lynch

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

zvi rosenzweig
bloomfield hills, MI
yrosenzweig@financialguide.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Lance Wakefield
Mankato, MN
lance.wakefield@nm.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

John Martin
Fresno, CA
marting.john.v@principal.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Too many rules do not make for a better society!

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services. You have no idea, how this is going to hurt the average person trying to figure out the already complicated rules and regulations on retirement plans now.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jennifer Mann
Chicago, IL
jmann@lenoxadvisors.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

I have recently rolled over several 401ks for clients that have switched jobs. When I met them, one was going to leave the 401k where it was (in spite of the uncertainty of the company continuing to operate going forward), and one was going to take some money out to pay for an upcoming vacation. I did receive commissions for rolling these over into mutual funds in an IRA. If I hadn't one, would have likely had a hard time getting at his money later and the other would have incurred taxes and penalties that she didn't realize she would get charged.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Tracy Haus
middletown, KY
tracy@tracyhaus.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

I am a local advisor and if this rule is put into place it will hurt those who need assistance setting up plans to save. Less people will start plans without our help.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.
- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.
- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.
- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Timothy Potjer
Byron Center, MI
tpotjer@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Sandra Knoll
Keystone Heights, FL
sandra.knoll@mwarep.org
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Marcus Hanna
Willoughby, OH
scottohio.insurance@gmail.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

John Davis
Chattanooga, TN
john@jmdgroupllc.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Kale Kroupa
Wichita, KS
kale.kroupa@axa-advisors.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Sam Spivey
Bossier City, LA
sam.spivey.b256@statefarm.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

David Kincannon
stephenville, TX
davidkincannon@live.com

07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My daily goal is to always be putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for over 40 years and they know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Thomas H Herlong
Johnston, SC
therlong@herlonganddorran.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

David Montgomery
Jacksonville, FL
david.montgomery@prudential.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Nelson,

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Joseph Wald
Dickinson, ND
jfwald@ft.newyorklife.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Sergio Herrera
Miami, FL
sergio@sergioherrera.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Scot Bradstreet
Stratham, NH
sbradstreet@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Rebecca Balck
Katy, TX
rebecca.balck.fh6u@statefarm.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Alan Silver
Hayward, CA
alan@silvergroup.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

James Mock
West Bloomfield, MI
jamesmock@massmutualbrokerage.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

stephen kende
Plattsburgh, NY
sjkende@financialguide.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Philip Ferrara CLU
Canton, MA
pferrara@dmi.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Kevin Leahy
Forked River, NJ
klea3@allstate.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Tanya Burns
Orlando, FL
tanya@tanyalburns.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Mark Horman
Columbia, SC
mhorman@metlife.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Graham Taylor
Jacksonville, FL
taylor.graham@principal.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Josh Mudford
Texarkana, TX
cmudford@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

William Warren
West Des Moines, IA
bill.warren@centralfinancialgroup.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Art Allen
Wichita, KS
awallen@ft.newyorklife.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Paul Crouch
Lake Forest, IL planned.futures@comcast.net
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

David Stateman
Fort lauderdale, FL
davidstateman@allstate.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Gerard Thomson
Albuquerque, NM
gthomson@ft.newyorklife.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

G Gregory Biggs
Oklahoma City, OK
greg@biggsfinancial.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft puts handcuffs on advisors who want to help clients who are in defined contribution plans. Many times employees retire and want to know what to do with their 401k savings. In my case I'm an active manager who tries to protect as well as grow a clients assets. The new rules would not allow me to "rollover" an employees assets to my firm. I may very well be the only advisor they know and trust, but they would be forced to do business with another advisor. This is unfair to the client and the advisor. I take very serious my duties to current and potential clients and always put their best interests first. I hope I will be able to continue this in the future with clientele that put their trust in me every day.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kathryn Kelley
Toledo, OH
klsharpe@yahoo.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

David Hand
Boise, ID
dhand@ft.newyorklife.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Christopher Barnthouse Carmel, IN
chris.barnthouse@nm.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Steve Holt
Roanoke, VA
steven.holt@axa-advisors.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Michael Shephard
cuyahoga falls, OH
mshephard@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Michael Lugo
Newport Beach, CA
mlugo@benefitmanagementspecialists.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Scott Donnellan
Clarksville, TN
scott@jackturner.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Rhonda Lancaster
brooklyn, NY
lancasterplanning@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Tim Brungardt
Norfolk, NE
tbrungardt@heritagefin.net

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Rick Hayes
Salem, OR
coachrhayes@me.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

ROSS PERLOE
ATLANTA, GA
rperloe@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Clyde DeRego CLU
Spokane, WA
cdderego@ft.newyorklife.com

07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Betty Roberson
Gaffney, SC
bproberson@charter.net
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

John Qualy
Clayton, MO
johnmqualy@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

TED TASKY
BUFFALO GROVE, IL
tnttgd@aol.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Craig Hardy
Johnson City, TN
hardyins@juno.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors. Agents and Registered Reps, such as my self, have long worked with suitability requirements of both state regulations and SEC regulation. We have preserved and enhanced the retirement savings of ordinary Americans who otherwise would not have had access to meaningful information about their decisions.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for close to thirty years, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Steve Griffin CFP
Sarasota, FL
sagriffin@eaglestrategies.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

LIANEL HERNANDEZ
BRONX, NY
lianelhernandez@gmail.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Joy Knox
Houston, TX
joy.knox.b335@statefarm.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Don Kirk
Pittsfield, IL
don.kirk@nm.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Cheryl Gunsell, CLU, CLTC
Castro Valley, CA
dgunsell@sbcglobal.net

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Steven Reed
Des Moines, IA
steven.reed@nm.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Senator Ernst, Senator Grassley, Representative Young and Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Krystine Ma
Garland, TX
kma@ft.newyorklife.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Thomas Littleton
Nacogdoches, TX
tll-pal@sbcglobal.net
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Timothy Havens
Rocky Gap, VA
timandamyhavens@verizon.net
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Clint Durocher
reno, NV
cdurocher@farmersagent.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

R.Terry Lawson
N. Augusta, SC, SC
terrylawson@dhbailieagency.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Geoff Luchetta
Denver, CO
dump4me@msn.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Preston Schotte
Wichita, KS
pschotte@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Katherine Wichmann Zacharias
Encinitas, CA
thewic@sbcglobal.net

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

S. Ann Pugh
Clinton, MO
sannpugh@billhouk.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Frank Levine
Livingston, NJ
flevine@cfsllc.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jim Jasper
Naperville, IL
jjasper@hoopisgroup.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jamie Shapiro
Melville, NY
js Shapiro@ft.newyorklife.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jarod Rucker
Wichita, KS
jrucker@ft.newyorklife.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Cheryl Tidwell
Sherwood, AR
cheryl.tidwell@mwarep.org
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Lars Willerup
Modesto, CA
willerup@sbcglobal.net
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Michael Rosenberg
Toledo, OH
mickey.rosenberg@savageandassociates.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services. I have spent the last 51 years attempting to assist my clients in all economic strata, from millionaires to those with net worth of less than $100,000. All are wonderful people who simply don't have the time or energy to learn as much about their financial situations as they would like. They all appear to feel the need for some assistance. My effort and that of my associates has been to do all we can to help. They know their respective job requirements. We know how to help them derive the most from their assets and pension benefits.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Evan Walker
Camillus, NY
evanhwalker@gmail.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

James Sugrue
Milton, NY
jjsugrue@ft.newyorklife.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Matthew Meeker
Whitehouse, OH
mmeeker@financialguide.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

DianaLou Danger-Wolff
Kingston, NY
dianalou@benefit-counseling.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Tracie Amador
Fort Worth, TX
tracie@tmahony.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

David Ion
Los Osos, CA
insuranceonramp@gmail.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Sondra Hicks
Gulfport, MS
sondrah@allstate.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Amy Falcon
Metairie, LA
amy@amyfalcon.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Gene Englin
Emmetsburg, IA
gene@englinfinancial.com

07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Gary Eschels
Bloomfield, MI
randy@eschelsfinancial.net

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Richard Dent
bixby, OK
rjdent@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Mike Breedlove
Tyler, TX
mikekayb@suddenlink.net
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Aaron Simon Traverse City, MI
adsimon@aaamichigan.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Patricia A. Chesebrough CAE
Scottsdale, AZ
naifa-az@azis.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Frank Virgallito
Glendale, CA
fvirgallito@arktoswealth.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Michelle Twitchell
Bartlett, IL
michellerenee1@sbcglobal.net
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

To Whom it May Concern,

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jay Moyer
Houston, TX
jay.moyer.t5t9@statefarm.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Michael Smith
Addison, TX
mssmith@htk.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Michael Dodge
Yorba Linda, CA
mikeandkristyn@gmail.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Robert Mills
Abilene, TX
robert@mmainvest.com

07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Senator Ted Cruz

Dear Senator John Coryn

Dear Representative Randy Neugebaur

Dear Secretary Perez

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Brent Flavin
Birmingham, AL
brent.flavin.ujlu@statefarm.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Patricia Miller
Jefferson City, MO
pmiller@naught-naught.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Leo Berger
Decatur, IL
leo.berger@comcast.net
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

jim young
MARIONVILLE, MO
jim@jyoungins.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jason Weydert
Brookfield, MO
jason@weydertinsurance.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Seth Becker
Fairmont, MN
seth@tbhfinancial.net
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Clarence Releford
Murfreesboro, TN
clarence@relefordagency.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Mark Jones
Houston, TX
marksjones@usa.net
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Vincente Thompson
Amarillo, TX
grant@tfinancialconcepts.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Toni Espey
Parkland, FL
tespey@aol.com

07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Doug Drelich
jacksonville, FL
dsd@dsdrelich.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Barbara Kreifels
Lincoln, NE
kreifels.b@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Paul Stern
Bellaire, TX
sternman@aol.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jo A. Casady CFP
Houston, TX
jcasady@elitemktg.net
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Elizabeth Mahony
Dallas, TX
ecmahony@yahoo.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Tony Kieffer
Maple Grove, MN
tony.kieffer@edwardjones.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Robert F. Butler, CLU
Toledo, OH
rfbutler@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Shawn Aguilar
Fort Lauderdale, FL
shawn.aguilar.d30f@statefarm.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Daniel Neale
Upland, CA
daniel.neale@american-national.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Gregory Harman
Germantown Hills, IL
greg@askgreg.net
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

marty montefel
weston, fl, FL
mmontefel@comcast.net
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Aaron W. Freitag ChFC CLU LUTCF
Peoria, IL
aaron@aaronfreitag.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Francesco Marcogliese
Fresno, CA
f.marcogliese@rgaassoc.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Carlos Martinez
Coral Gables, FL
carlos.martinez.jrle@statefarm.com

07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Duane Schroeder
Roanoke, IL
dasstfrm@mchsi.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Mark Burton
Mission Viejo, CA
miburton89@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

David McConnell
Westerville, OH
dmccconnell@financialguide.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Amy Setikas
American Canyon, CA
amysetikas@yahoo.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Stacy Clark
Prentiss, MS
stacy.clark.prb4@statefarm.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Dick Nolan
Annandale, NJ
imafkia@yahoo.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Dee McCord-Ochoa
Sunrise, FL
dee3ocho@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Rona Swanson
Visalia, CA
rona.swanson@american-national.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

David Nagelberg
East Brunswick, NJ
dnagelberg@execlife.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Marla Sprenger
Sidney, NE
mjsprenger@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

John Weidenfeller
Fort Collins, CO
john.d.weidenfeller@mwarep.org

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Howard Feldman
Rockville, MD
howard@howardfeldman.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Roger Peluso
Toledo, OH
roger.peluso@savageandassociates.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

David Cospers
Dunedin, FL
dave@davecosper.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Judy Baker
Casper, WY
jdbaker@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Charles Bosworth
Orlando, FL
chuck.bosworth@raymondjames.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Miles Moriyama
Honolulu, HI
miles.moriyama@pyramidins.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jeffrey Diehl
Appleton, WI
jpd@advisorygrp.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ryan Klyn
Des Moines, IA
ryan.klyn@voya.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

99% of all financial advisors always place the client/person's needs ahead of their own financial gain/interests.

registered Representative with VOYA Financial Advisors

Ryan Klyn

Andrea Ceballos
El Dorado, AR
andrea.ceballos.k4b3@statefarm.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Timothy McCahan
Providence, RI
tim.mccahan@nm.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- In many cases, cost the clients more to receive financial services.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jennifer Rankin
Plantation, FL
jbrankin928@yahoo.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Frank Harman
Roanoke, VA
fsage02@yahoo.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Wes Booker
White Hall, AR
wes.booker@horacemann.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

michael vassallo
essex fells, NJ
michael.vassallo@axa-advisors.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Timothy Dougherty
Jamison, PA
tdougherty@financialguide.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

I am a knowledgeable advisor with many credentials, including:

MSFS - Master of Science in Financial Services
CFP - Certified Financial Planner
C(k)P - Certified 401(k) Professional
AIF - Accredited Investment Fiduciary
CLU, ChFC, CLTC, CFBS

I have been awarded the Paul Mills Scholarship by the Society of Financial Service Professionals for lifelong commitment to ethics, education and volunteerism within the Financial Services Industry.

I am a Founding Lecturer for The Plan Sponsor University, providing Fiduciary education and training to Plan Sponsor Fiduciaries leading to the C(k)PF designation for a Plan Sponsor Fiduciary (stands for Certified 401(k) Plan Fiduciary). This is the only Plan Sponsor fiduciary education certification of its kind in the country.

I am a 10 year member of The Retirement Plan Advisory Group (RPAG), a group of over 475 Advisor Firms specializing in Retirement Plans, over 1,000 Advisors, representing over $150 billion in Retirement Plan Assets under Management. I was the first member in Philadelphia 10 years ago.

I am a Former President of NAIFA-Greater Philadelphia. I am very educated and have served my clients for over 29 years with passion, prudence, and have acted with my client's best interest.

My point is that I know what I am talking about. I am an expert on this subject! Please read my comments. I am available to you for discussion if you need to talk about these issues.

Here are some issues that I have with the DOL Proposed Regulations:

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans. This rule will require many qualified advisors to leave companies they have been with for decades in order to satisfy a senseless requirement of the DOL while creating no advantage for the client.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Our clients (who are Americans) want choice. They want disclosure, not restriction! The DOL's proposed regulation (if enacted) would eliminate choice. The net result will negatively affect average participants in Qualified Retirement Plans. The net result will negatively affect lower account balance IRA holders.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Participants in ERISA Qualified Retirement Plans should have access to advice from the advisor team who knows the most about the Plan in which they are a participant. The Retirement Plan Advisor is uniquely positioned to provide the most knowledge about the current investment in the plan. The Retirement Plan Advisor is the best positioned to provide a feasible business model to afford delivery of guidance and advice to a Participant. Outside Advisors will require a higher retail fee to deliver the very same services that could be delivered by the Retirement Plan Advisor serving the Plan.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

My clients turn to me for help. They know like and trust me. They know that I have their best interest at heart in all of my dealings and transactions. However, because I am the Retirement Plan Advisor to their ERISA Plan I am prevented from delivering service to a Participant who is leaving the plan and who needs Rollover assistance. The DOL considers this to be a Conflict of Interest and casts a net over this type of service as a Prohibited Transaction. And that is the case under the current law. It only gets worse in the Proposed Regulation, because under that model, no advisor could tip-toe through the BIC PTE's! Therefore, the result is that no advisor can help participants who leave their ERISA Retirement Plan. It is senseless government regulation over private markets resulting in deprivation of client choice. The result will produce a reduction of retirement readiness outcomes which is the wrong direction to take from a social policy perspective. We need your help!

Each retiree and pre-retiree is unique. PPA '06 introduced legislation to allow more annuities into ERISA Plans. Recent legislation introduced QLAC's (Qualified Longevity Annuity Contracts) as an opportunity. The DOL's Proposed Regulation will make it impossible to rollover money from an ERISA Plan to an Annuity of any kind due to the BIC PTE's. It will be IMPOSSIBLE to satisfy the BIC PTE's! People are living longer. We have accused DC Plans of not being as good as DB Plans for YEARS! While this accusation is bogus for today's transient population, it is important to recognize that American's lack the skill set required to manage lifetime income from their DC Plans, and they need our help. Life Insurance companies issue many different types of Annuities that allows the rollover participant to transfer longevity risk to an insurer, much like a Defined Benefit Plan does for participants. However, the transfer of lifetime income risk to a life insurance company represents a much lower risk of default than a DB plan risk transfer does. All you need to do is to look at the under-funding of DB Plans, the underfunding of the PBGC, and you will understand my point.

I am turning to you as your constituent and asking you to protect my clients freedom of choice regarding the business model they may choose to serve them. I am turning to you as your constituent and asking you to protect my business model as well. I am a 29 year veteran career agent of a very large Fortune 100 Mutual Life Insurance Company. Just because my primary company manufactures a product does not mean that I am conflicted and that I cannot act in my client's best interest. The proposed regulations will make it impractical to remain with a company as an Agent with a Career Contract since the DOL will consider that we have a Conflict of Interest when selling our own product.....even when we outsource the Investment Fiduciary function to a third party (such as Morningstar, Ibbotson, Wilshire, Mesirov, etc.). The DOL has sided with a business model that requires ERISA Plan Advisors (and in the future Participant ERISA Plan Rollover IRA Advisors) to leave the companies where they have decades of business and thousands of clients to serve, and then require them to leave their companies and affiliate with an independent company. This will result in massive waste (time and money lost for the advisor), and many client's who will become displaced (referred to as orphan clients in our business). This is not a good outcome for anyone!

I am available for consultation on this issue if you ever need to discuss the details with a knowledgeable advisor.

Please take action and require the DOL to simplify the language of the Proposed Regulations. Please side with your constituents who are Americans serving Americans. We need choice. Our clients are not concerned with the DOL's "perceived" Conflicts of Interest between Advisors and the companies they represent. Our clients are concerned with having access to the skill and services of the advisors they know, like and trust. They want disclosure, not regulation. Please act. Thank you.

Bill Abraham
Philadelphia, PA
bill@abeassociates.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Curtis Langemeier
Wisconsin Rapids, WI
curtis.langemeier@mwarep.org
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Diana Caine-Helwig
Etters, PA
naardmb7@ptd.net
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Chad S. Baker
Upper Sandusky, OH
csbaker@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Don Compton Sellersburg, IN
donc@compton.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

David Pike
Wichita, KS
dpike@ft.newyorklife.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ben Brockman
The Woodlands, TX
bbrockman@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jeff Layne CLU ChFC LUTCF

N. Chesterfield, VA

jeff_layne@yahoo.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Harold Jarvis
Bedford, NH
hjarvis@financialguide.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Duncan Johnson
Los Altos, CA
duncanjohnson@pacbell.net
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

James Kenney
Clifton Park, NY
james.kenney@nm.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Eric Williams
El Paso, TX
ecwilliams@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Erich Beck
Smithtown, NY
erich.beck@axa-advisors.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Gary Myers
Augusta, KS
gmyers@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Greg Gertz
Northbrook, IL
gregory.gertz@nm.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Conrad McCook
St Albans, NY
cmccook@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

JAY POLLACK
PARKLAND, FL
jpollack@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Tony Snider
Cottontown, TN
basnider@woodmen.org
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Geoffrey Suval
Reisterstown, MD
gsuval@firstfinancialgroup.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jerri W Batts
Wilson, NC
jerri.batts@axa-advisors.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Renee Montenyohl
Aiken, SC
a081559@allstate.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Lloyd pomerantz
New York, NY
lloyd@miller-pomerantz.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kevin Lammers
Newark, DE
kevinelammers@aol.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Laura Schrutka
San Antonio, TX
lauraschrutka@yahoo.com

07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jeremiah Lurken
mankato, MN
jlurken@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Robert Redel
Jefferson City, MO
bredel@naught-naught.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Daisy Pena
League City, TX
daisy.g.pena@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

David Wyatt
Taylors, SC
dtwyatt@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Roger George
Fresno, CA
rogergeorge8000@sbcglobal.net
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Joseph F. Labeledz
Omaha, NE
jlabeledz@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Bruce Pockey
Parkland, FL
bpockey@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Nora A Brooks
Shreveport, LA
nora.brooks.gzov@statefarm.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Recently, I helped Brenda decide what to do with her deceased husband's 401(k) account after he died. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for Brenda. I helped Brenda decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet her risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds and an annuity. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Brenda would instead just cash out her husband's 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if she hadn't had access to my services.

TJ Tingley
Robinson, IL
tj@tjtingley.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

Recently, I helped Dennis decide what to do with her 401(k) account when her employment terminated. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for Dennis. I helped Dennis decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet Dennis's risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds and an annuity. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Dennis would instead just cash out his 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if he hadn't had access to my services.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Raj Venkatraman
Lisle, IL
rajvenkatraman@voya.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Patrick Mammoser
Newton, IL
patrick.mammoser@countryfinancial.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Chris Naquin
Destrehan, LA
chris.naquin@axa-advisors.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Clayton Cheney
West Des Moines, IA
clayton.cheney@centralfinancialgroup.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Eric Flatt
Indianapolis, IN
eflatt@financialguide.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Daniel F. Clements, CLU
Tempe, AZ
daniel.f.clements@metlife.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jorge Diaz
Norman, OK
jdiazdruet@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Philip Gallant
Clifton Park, NY
phil@theoptimusgroupllc.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Thomas McCaffrey
Hattiesburg, MS
a023916@allstate.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Harold D. Shappell, III
Longview, TX
tshappell@dhinsurance.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Nicholas Baurichter
Boca Raton, FL
nicholas.baurichter@axa-advisors.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Scott Dorminy
Russellville, AR
sdorminy@farmersagent.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Doug Bierman
Stevens Point, WI
dbierman@metlife.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Scott Leavitt
Boise, ID
saladl@aol.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Mark GARRISON
Easley, SC
paladin1650@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Patricia Bauman
Las Vegas, NV
trishjbauman@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Debbie Grenemeier
Lincoln, NE
dgrenemeier@bramcofinancial.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Timothy J Potjer CFP,CHFC
Byron Center, MI
tpotjer@ft.newyorklife.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Daniel Scholz
omaha, NE
dan@ameritasfc.net
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Mark Walters
Chatham, NJ
markz.walters@raymondjames.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Kim Farmer
Columbus, GA
kim2900@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Brett Peterson
Centerville, UT
brett@beradvisors.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Greg Toscano
Duluth, MN
gtoscano@jicbenefits.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Gene Beerbohm
Kearney, NE
gbeerbohm@charter.net
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Vincent Rogers
Alamosa, CO
vrogers@voyafa.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Keith Deras
Omaha, NE
kderas@financialguide.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Robert Maurice
Chattanooga, TN
rmaurice@farmersagent.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ryan Kelly
Greenwood, IN
rkelly1@farmersagent.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

KISSI HIGGINBOTTHAM

Shreveport, LA

kissi_k@yahoo.com

07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Michael Nassr
Carmichael, CA
nassrjrma@msn.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Thomas Sherman
Rye Brook, NY
tsherman@strategiesforwealth.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

LECESTER HENDERSON MILWAUKEE, WI
lhenderson@metlife.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Valencia Jones
Cloutierville, LA
vsjones@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

DEREK BUTLER
Thousand Oaks, CA
dbut@aol.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Irma Jauregui
Santa Ana, CA
irmapj@yahoo.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

I work with lower middle class and our Hispanic community, as it is there are so many people hurting for lack of help, on retirement and the only help they get is from their employers and this will only hurt them more! Please help our community have access to advise at work and outside advisors that cost is not cumbersome or advisors are limited to who they can help!

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jason Valentin
Bronx, NY
jason.valentin@nm.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Marcus Shock
Conway, AR
msshock@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Penny Hardrick
Palisade, CO
pjhardrick@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Larry Bitterman
Belgrade, MT
larry.bitterman.guw1@statefarm.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Dennis Rife
Holland, OH
dennis.rife@savageandassociates.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Matt Barnard
St. Charles., MO
mbarnard@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Larry Welder
Ventura, IA
lwelder@gfsinvest.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Cameron Reeves
Prosper, TX
cmreeves@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Gordon Sherry
Port Saint Lucie, FL
bsherry@allstate.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Rachel Rost
San Antonio, TX
rachel.v.rost@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

David Watson
Reston, VA
davidwatson1998@live.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Don Nottingham
Summerfield, FL
notts@embarqmail.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Brian Green
Lawrence, KS
brianjay1@allstate.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jasper E. Parrella
Morrisville, PA
j.parrella@verizon.net
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jonette Phillips
Altadena, CA
jonette@jonettephillips.net
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Katia Stiefel
Westborough, MA
kstiefel@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Don Sibold
Pickaway, WV
donsibold@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Tim Balfe
Greenwood Village, CO
tim.balfe@wealthsg.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Cindy Fierro
el paso, TX
cindy.fierro.jvmp@statefarm.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Mark Isenberg
New Hope, MN
misenberg@steinfg.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Mark Cole
Austintown, OH
markcoleins@aol.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Kelly Berry
Edmond, OK
bkellyberry@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Haile Lytton
Richmond, VA
haile@lyttoninsurance.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Allen Bowler
Eagle River, AK
al.bowler.b9rf@statefarm.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Greg Turner
Anniston, AL
greg@insuranceplanning.us

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Joey Hensley
Spring, TX
joseph.hensley@axa-advisors.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

Recently, I helped Linda decide the best course of action with her 401(k) account upon terminating employment. We took into account her other assets, time horizon, and retirement and other financial goals. After comprehensively analyzing her situation, the decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was in her best interest. I helped Linda decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet Linda's risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance- skills the average investor does not have access to the knowledge, resources, or time to achieve. I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds and an annuity. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Linda would instead just cash out her 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if she hadn't had access to my services.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Joel Berkovitz
Brooklyn, NY
joelb133@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Nathan Sebesta
College Station, TX
nathansebesta@yahoo.com

07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Danny Fernandez
Miami, FL
danny@dannyfernandez.net
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

William Knight Jr.
FORT PIERCE, FL
bill.knight.bxij@statefarm.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Christopher-Paul Romo
Davis, CA
paul.romo@adviserfocus.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez, Senator Boxer, Senator Feinstein and Representative Garamendi:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a decade or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans. Many of my business owner clients would view a fee-for-service model as an unnecessary expense and cease to offer retirement plans to their employees.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

On a regular basis, I help my plan participants decide the best way for them to distribute and manage their retirement plan assets. I am currently working with over 20 clients to help them make this decision. One client, Frank, was considering taking out his entire $170,000 balance to pay for part of his daughters wedding and put the rest in the bank. He had no background to understand the dangerous tax ramifications of this costly decision. He also did not understand the long-term effects of the time value of money. I have been able to discuss his entire financial situation with him to make appropriate decisions that take these things into account, and I will be compensated through commissions for some of these investment products.

Another client, Tonnette, is very risk-averse, yet needs to maintain long-term purchasing power. Without the protection of a variable annuity guarantees, she would also leave her money sitting in the bank where it would not be working for her.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Joseph McCarthy
Chesterfield, MO
jmccarthy@woodburyfinancial.net
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Karla Gareau
Troy, NY
karla_gareau@wagroupllc.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Elizabeth Martin
Cape Coral, FL
elizabeth.f.martin@mwarep.org
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Matt Johnson
Defiance, MO
matt.johnson@woodburyfinancial.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Edmund Duckworth
Brenham, TX
tduckworth@germaniainsurance.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

William D Boggs
Oxford, MS
doug.boggs@sfbcc.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

WENDY W. BECK TEMPERANCE, MI
wwbeck@ft.nyl.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Sydney Garrett Farmington, NM
panther20@live.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Tyler R. Breed
Fenton, MO
tbreed@charter.net
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

fawne atkinson elkhart, IN fawne@callfawne.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Shahbaz Hasnain MBA bakersfield, CA
shasnain@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Anthony Krncevic
Toledo, OH
tony.krncevic@savageandassociates.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Please don't rush this DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32). As you have seen from myriad letters sent by my peers in the industry, the new rule has some serious flaws in its current state. Continued dialogue among all parties involved is needed before proceeding with such a huge measure.

There will always be a small number of unscrupulous, lazy, or greedy individuals in any industry for whom rules and regulations need to be created; but the majority of us, who take care of people's financial lives for a living, who help them to secure a retirement and achieve their life's goals, and who care deeply about our clients and their families, are doing the right thing for our clients, day in and day out. And we, who without question always put our clients' best interest first without ever having to be asked, believe this proposed rule will harm us and more importantly our clients.

Please don't allow the rule to be enacted in its current form, because it will hinder our ability to serve our clients in the best way possible, which will in turn hinder the very clients that all of us -- you and I alike -- are working to help and protect.

Please listen to the voices in the industry, explore thoroughly the reasons given, and address the serious, well-founded concerns about the Rule (RIN 1210-AB32) that are being brought before you. We all have the best interests of our clients in mind; Please take the time to examine the drastic effects and unintended consequences this new rule is very likely to create.

A. Christopher Engle CFP
Grand Rapids, MI
chris@eyeonargus.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Dan Ferrin
Queen Creek, AZ
dan.d.ferrin@mwarep.org
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

eddie wilt
Lubbock, TX
eddie.wilt.b30q@starefarm.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Brian Bordic
Cedar Park, TX
brian.bordic@mwarep.org
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Krista Kecskemety
Lyndhurst, OH
bill.insurance@gmail.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Carrie Sayre
Ft Worth, TX
carriedsayre@yahoo.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Chris Worrall
Honolulu, HI
chris.worrall@nm.com
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Curt Neises
Howard, SD
curt@minerins.com
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Larry Richardson
Floresville, TX
larry.j.richardson@mwarep.org
07/21/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Neal Engwall
St Petersburg, FL
nealengwall@msn.com
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Matthew Mallette
Manasquan, NJ
matthew_mallette@ca-strategy.com
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Guy Brickman, CLU, ChFC, CASL
Miami, FL
gbrickman1@aol.com

07/21/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

I have been in business 50 years - 50 years of helping my clients make wise decisions for their Retirement and later years. Under the proposal this will all end and my clients will be making sometimes the wrong decisions for their future.

Mike Fiamingo
morro bay, CA
mifarm@aol.com

07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Alan Blecker
Upper Saddle River, NJ
ablecker.blecker@gmail.com
07/21/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Ashley Reeder
New Athens, IL
ashley.reeder@countryfinancial.com
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Patrick Thomas
Sylmar, CA
patrickt@roadrunner.com
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Giles Clasen
Denver, CO
dgclasen@ft.newyorklife.com
07/21/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

First, I support a change in the fiduciary responsibilities of all who make recommendations to clients about their 401(k) and other investments. I believe the work you are doing is extremely important. My concern is that the action put forward is too broad and may hinder the options of investors. Please take great care in expanding the regulation here. I believe new regulations should be in place. I even argued with my partner today about responding, because I support what you are doing. I work primarily with middle income Americans. Expanding regulation is extremely important. But taking away investment options from middle income Americans will ultimately hurt those you are seeking to help.

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Paul Peele
Norfolk, VA
ptpeelee@cox.net

07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Courtney Cuykendall
Morristown, NJ
courtney@spencerbenefits.com
07/21/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Doris Watson
Broken Arrow, OK
doirs.watson.ceu0@statefarm.com
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Joseph DiTorrice
Belle Mead, NJ
jditorrice@ft.newyorklfie.com

07/21/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Martin Dodge
Kalamazoo, MI
mdodge@chartermi.net
07/21/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Joseph Radovic
Dallas, TX
joeradovic@yahoo.com
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Barry Nash
Manasquan, NJ
barry_nash@ca-strategy.com
07/21/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Donald Albach
Monroe Twp, NJ
donald_albach@ca-strategy.cm
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Bradley Kinoshita
Hilo, HI
brad-k@hawaiiantel.net
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

William Wise
Brentwood, TN
bill.wise@aig.com
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Michael Ferrara
Piscataway, NJ
michael_ferrara@ymail.com
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Charles Lovejoy
Rochester, NY
clovejoy@financialguide.com
07/21/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Paula Austin
Bridgeton, NJ
paula@paustin.com
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Glisel Jimenez ChFC, CLU Raritan, NJ
glisel@gliseljimenez.com

07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Louis Pettinato
Old Forge, PA
pettil1@nationwide.com

07/21/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Logan Dietel
New Braunfels, TX
logan.dietel@icloud.com
07/21/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Michael Sandler
Schuylkill Haven, PA
mrs10721@huskies.bloomu.edu
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Shirley Saul
Davie, FL
shirley@shirleysaul.com
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Sunita Sharma
Cerritos, CA
sunitasharma@ft.newyorlife.com
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jim Morella
Tulsa, OK
jmorella@financialguide.com
07/21/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Blaise Guzzetta
Friendswood, TX
bguzzetta@sagepointadvisor.com
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Matthew Young Hurricane, WV
matt@wvhfs.com

07/21/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jarrett Gosson
Fort Myers, FL
jarrett.gosson@mwarep.org
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Shaun Hamada
Kaneohe, HI
shaun@shaunhamada.com

07/21/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Giselle Thackrey
DAVIE, FL
giselle@davieinsurance.com

07/21/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Steven Mooney
Hillsborough, NJ
stevenmooney73@yahoo.com

07/21/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Bret Davenport
San Antonio, TX
brtdvnprt@yahoo.com
07/21/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Wayne Schmidt
Mandeville, LA
wayne@anbrokerage.com
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Christi Daughenbaugh
sunnyvale, TX
cmdaughenbaugh@bordenhamman.com
07/21/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jeffrey Green
Cape Coral, FL
jmgreen56@comcast.net
07/21/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Margy Gray
Indiana, PA
margy.gray.puyr@statefarm.com
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Thomas R. Holmes
Plainwell, MI
thomas.r.holmes@mwarep.org
07/21/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Wayne Tanaka
Kailua, HI
wtanaka@financialguide.com
07/21/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

David Capo
Metairie, LA
david.capo@nm.com
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jacquelyn Coy
MountArlington, NJ
jsc164@aol.com

07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Steve Evans
ASHLAND, NE
sevans_financial@windstream.net
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Geoffrey Henson
San Antonio, TX
jhenson@satx.rr.com
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

RE: Proposed fiduciary rule concerning retirement investment advice.

I have been a licensed insurance agent and advisor for 43 years. During that time I have committed much of my time and resources to continued personal development and improvement, precisely because I believe that customers deserve my absolute best efforts and opinions. They know I have their best interests foremost in my mind, not just because of those efforts, but also because my continued membership in educational organizations which require extremely high ethical standards while interacting with any members of the public.

The proposed DOL fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is ill-considered, at least, and unworkable, at best. The proposal will confuse investors and increase costs while interfering with advisors' ability to provide retirement invest.

My company deals with many people in a marketplace that is underserved by financial advisors precisely because they don't have hundreds of thousands of dollars for investment and risk management. The proposal will drastically reduce opportunities for those people to receive information about a myriad of financial services products, precisely when they most need appropriate advice and investment education.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Please re-write this unworkable rule.

Michelle Talley
Floresville, TX
michelle@talleybenefits.com

07/21/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Recently, I helped Elaine decide what to do with her 401k account when she terminated employment. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for Jane. I helped Jane decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet Jane's risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds and an annuity. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Jane would instead just cash out her 401(k) and would suffer the tax and early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if she hadn't had access to my services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Michael Bernard
Salem, OR
michael.j.bernard@mwarep.org
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Legislators:

We believe the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

Recently, I helped a working Mom decide what to do with her 401(k) account when she terminated employment. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for her. I helped decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet her risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of a variable annuity. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Teresa would instead just cash out her 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if she hadn't had access to my services.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Derek Reed
Gloucester, MA
derek@beauportfinancial.com
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Duane Merchant
Boca Raton, FL
merchantcapcorp@gmail.com
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Dennis Kim Mililani, HI
dennischkim@gmail.com
07/21/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

If the current proposal is adopted, many of my clients who currently rely on my advice will be confused and may have to rely on their own knowledge to determine what is best for themselves. One example: currently I help many clients with their IRA - some of them put only $1000 a year into their program because they are cash strapped. I help them even though the commissions (paid by the company) are very small. If I tell them that from now on, you will have to pay me a fee on top of your $1000, the added cost would then be a financial burden to them. So to them, having the company pay me is more acceptable than they having to pay me a fee directly.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Robert Colford
Cranston401, RI
ci19761@verizon.net
07/21/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Wesley Moyer
apex, NC
wesley.m.moyer@mwarep.org
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Scott Kimmel
ft worth tx, TX
kimmel.scott@principal.com
07/21/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kevin Zeyen
Fishers, IN
kzeyen@financialguide.com

07/21/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Mendy Dunn
Metairie, LA
mendy@mendydunn.com
07/21/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Roy Imai
Honolulu, HI
roy.imai@gmail.com
07/21/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Bill Loventhal
Dunwoody, GA
bill.loventhal@nm.com

07/21/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Donna Thomas
Jacksonville, FL
dtpicturethis59@gmail.com

07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Donald Fleming
Paramus, NJ
donddcf@yahoo.com
07/21/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Representative Scott Garrett:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to administer. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an adviser from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisers to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisers from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisers can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an adviser to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisers and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisers to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an adviser to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the adviser and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be administered as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the adviser, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the adviser and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ryan Neely Claremore, OK
rneely@htk.com

07/21/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Doug Hortin
Albion, IL
doug.hortin@countryfinancial.com
07/21/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Sharon King
Fort Lauderdale, FL
slking4u@gmail.com
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Lynne Crow
Short Hills, NJ
lcrow@cfsllc.com

07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm adviser-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisers to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisers.

As written the rule prohibits an adviser from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisers can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisers and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisers to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

When you propose legislation this complex it leads to unintended consequences. Please reconsider your proposed legislation before you vote on it.

Anderson Jones
Atlanta, GA
andy.jones@nm.com
07/21/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Keith Klueter
Chesterfield, MO
kklueter@woodburyfinancial.net
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Karen Offerdahl
honolulu, HI
vikngprncss@hotmail.com

07/21/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jack Gilliam
Carthage, MO
jack.gilliam@prudential.com
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Nathan Goldwasser
Upper Montclair, NJ
ngoldwasser@metlife.com

07/21/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Janet Heitzig
Chesterfield, MO
heitzig.janet@principal.com
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

I am writing to you today regarding the DOL's proposed fiduciary rule regarding retirement advice. I ask you to join with me to oppose this proposed rule.

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

Just because I oppose the rule does not mean that I oppose the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients. Under the current regulations I am able to work with people across the board of the economic stratum. I will help clients preserve a retirement plan balance of under $5000 or $500,000 depending upon their situation. Believe me, the person with only $5000 in retirement savings needs my advice as much or more than the person with a higher balance. And, there is as much paperwork and preparation time on my part for a $5000 balance as well as $500,000. Although my compensation is much less on small balances, this is what I do...help people!

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

David Allen
Jackson, MS
david_allen-ga@glic.com
07/21/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Terry Shepro
Reno, NV
terry@sheproinsurance.com
07/21/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. Please do not support this regulation as it now is written.

Yolanda Tam
Hurricane, WV
ytam@ft.brwyorklife.com

07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Melanie Kohler
Johns Creek, GA
melanie.kohler@nm.com

07/21/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ruth Ahnen
Bettendorf, IA
ruth.ahnen@mwarep.org
07/21/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Angele Statuti Pettinato

Linwood, NJ

astatuti@verizon.net

07/21/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Greg Berstler
Lincoln, NE
greg@berstlergroup.com
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Kenneth Swift II
Orlando, FL
kenneth.swift@axa-advisors.com
07/21/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kamlesh Shah Jersey City, NJ
kshah@metlife.com
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jean Harmison
Springfield, MO
jean@clubmanagementservices.com

07/21/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

James Hunter Turasky
Lake in the Hills, IL
hturasky@gmail.com
07/21/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Darin Parks
Centennial, CO
darin.parks@horacemann.com

07/21/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

R Ross Johnson
Houston, TX
rrjohnson@seniorprogroup.com
07/21/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Giuseppe Bianco
Hoboken, NJ
giuseppe.a.bianco@gmail.com

07/21/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Joe Nugent
oak ridge, NJ
joseph.nugent@prudential.com
07/21/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Ken Miley
East greenville, PA
myholmey1@yahoo.com
07/21/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Boris Lokshin
Newton, MA
boris_lokshin@glic.com
07/21/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.