

Gary Roberts
Lincoln, NE
gwroberts@financialguide.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kay Georgiana
Hastings, NE
kaygeorgiana@windstream.net
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Anne Doerrer
Shoreview, MN
adoerrer@farmersagent.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

A. Bonita Brakefield
Purcell, OK
a.brakefield@prudential.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

This would be an injustice to our clients in successfully planning their future retirement. Please look deeper into the facts and lives at stake. We have to help baby boomers as there will already be a strain on Social Security. This is one of the most important issues facing us today!!

Joseph Burgess
Minneapolis, MN
joe.burgess@northstarfinancial.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jim Allen
Lone Tree, CO
allenkj@me.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Andrew Kryzer
Inver Grove Heights, MN
andrew@integratedequity.net
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Sopros Sok
Columbia, MO
sopros.sok@axa-advisors.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Lori Broussard
Lafayette, LA
lori.broussard@prudential.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Grant Winn II
Stevensville, MT
gwinnwis@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Lawrence Lexow
Edwardsville, IL
larry@bcl401k.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have real consequence of providing many retirement savers with access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

I urge the Department of Labor to continue with the fiduciary rule as written and require financial advisors to act in the Best Interest of our clients.

Jeffrey Blizzard
Modesto, CA
jeff.blizzard.le22@statefarm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Mike Grandgeorge
Ames, IA
mike.grandgeorge@american-national.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to

discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Roger McDowell
Kennewick, WA
mcdowellroger3@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Joe B. Jones
Lawrence, KS
joe.jones@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Tim Kiesling
Menomonee Falls, WI
tim@timkiesling.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Adam Gross
Billings, MT
agross@retire-solutions.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Recently, I helped my client, Daniel decide what to do with her 401(k) account when she terminated employment at the Oil Rigs. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for Daniel and his wife. I helped Daniel and his wife decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet their risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase an annuity. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Daniel and his wife would instead just cash out their 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if they hadn't had access to my services.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Raymond Kojetin
Great Falls, MT
raykojetin@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Nicholas Sprincz
Littleton, CO
nick@askkeithsprincz.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Steven Randolph
Newport Beach, CA
stevenleerandolph@yahoo.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Andrew Reimer
Guttenberg, IA
areimer@ft.newyorklife.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ted kaminski
St anthony, MN
teddy6869@yahoo.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Courtney Morrow
Templeton, CA
courtney@courtneymorrow.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kevin Weis
La Crosse, WI
kevin.weis@mutualofomaha.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing regarding my concern with the DOL's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, difficult and costly, if not impossible, to operationalize.

Recently, I helped a client of mine, Mary decide what to do with her 401(k) account when she terminated employment. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for her. I helped Mary decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet her risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Mary would instead just cash out her 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if she hadn't had access to my services.

Employees need advice regarding their investments, such as their 401(k) assets, which are likely the largest pool of retirement savings they will ever have. If I, along with other advisors across the nation, are unable to provide our services due to a new complicated and difficult fiduciary rule, I am afraid many of our nation's pre-retirees and retirees will be adversely affected.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

Employees need advice when moving plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to consider these areas when looking to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Nick Taber
Missoula, MT
nick_taber@glic.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez, Senator Daines, Senator Tester, and Representative Zinke:

Thank you very much for your service to help protect Montanans, and Americans from legislation that does more harm, than good. This work from the DOL will create much more harm, than any good.

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Lenny Tomson
Lighthouse Point, FL
lenny.tomson@yahoo.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Peter Buechler CFP, CLU, ChFC
Orange, CA
peterb@cohesiveinsurance.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Dan Grzywa
Papillion, NE
dgrzywa@amfam.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

David Peters
Santa Barbara, CA
dave@petersmilam.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Joseph S Bradley ChFC
Taylorsville, UT
joseph.bradley@oasecurities.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Donna Saarem
Kennewick, WA
dtsprinces@yahoo.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

I have worked with numerous customers this year alone who would not otherwise have any retirement plan, other than a 401k, which they would likely cash in. So many people need guidance and education, the little guy, who can have access to someone who can and will help them!

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Chris Mitchell
New Braunfels, TX
mitchcrm@reagan.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Rob Heegel
Kennewick, WA
robbie.heegel@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Cliff Wilson
Gilbert, AZ
cwilson@sazagency.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Deborah Tanner
Westminster, CO
ddimanna@farmersagent.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

I have many clients that would have been financially harmed with surrender fees, early withdrawal penalties, premature taxation, and no one to support them with appropriate advice, if the fiduciary rule were in place as proposed. The demographic we serve do not have access nor can they afford access to fee based planners. Third party compensation is pennies on the dollar to what fee based planners charge for advice. If this regulation moves forward as proposed, our clients will most certainly run out of money in retirement placing a larger burden on our already strained government funds.

Please contact me if you would like specific stories regarding the support we provide our clients and how the DOL proposed regulation will harm them.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Peter Fulchiron
Novato, CA
pfagent@icloud.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Ryan Palmquist
Omaha, NE
ryan.palmquist@curnesgroup.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Annalisa Sullivan
Escondido, CA
annalisa.sullivan@american-national.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

David Nabity
Omaha, NE
dnabs@nabity.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Paul Westhoven
Parker, CO
paulwesthoven@hotmail.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions.

The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need education on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it will reduce access to necessary educational information, and result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement.

The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, Best Interest Contract Exemption, BIC, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to IRAs.

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to urge the Department to make necessary changes to help American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Robert Stanlick
Colorado Springs, CO
rstanlick@presidentialbrokerage.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Tom Brunette
Colorado Springs, CO
tbrunette@farmersagent.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Philip Goodge
Cathedral City, CA
phil.goodge.pmk2@statefarm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Rod Jewell
Omaha, NE
rejewell@financialguide.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I help several hundred people every year on their retirement plans and have for 33 years . People need more advice and help . Nothing I see in this proposal will make it easier or more effective for me or my clients to help people achieve their goals.

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Martin Culver Carmel, IN
martyculver@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Craig Adamson
Marion, IA
craig.adamson@lpl.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is full of good intent, but your aggressive "anti-advisor" language and the aggressive rhetoric of President Obama paints a very broad brush of tar and feathers and mud over our entire industry.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. It would be hard to own my own business these last 15 years, and serve clients for a total of 19 years, if I didn't have their best interests in mind. I cannot believe your office is that out of touch with America that it isn't more obvious that millions of investors are well-served every single day by advisors who earn fees and/or -GASP!!- a commission when doing work for clients.

I find it deliciously ironic that so many industries like real estate agents (residential and commercial), auto sales, engineering, etc. charge fees and earn commissions from their work. In most cases these one-time transactions that require little or no on-going monitoring. Yet there is no hew and cry from DOL or other federal agencies about how much fees impact the cost of the transaction. Yet advisors are expected to have the clients best interest in mind, but not earn any money at the time of purchase, nor for providing future service. I can see that you are a bureaucrat... this is not how the real world works. People get paid to work in the private sector. If we don't work, we don't get paid. And if we make bad decisions, we don't get paid... unlike yourself. You can hide in the bureaucracy and still collect a check.

The proposal is harmful to investors and advice seekers of all demographics, but in particular to the middle and low income savers. With millions of Americans in retirement and millions more retiring in the next 14 years it seems odd for the DOL to have such a negative focus on ostracizing the ability of clients to seek advice when they need it most. You are also trying to place restrictions where not previously existed to interact between client and advisor. So we have "Obamacare" to increase access to healthcare for all Americans, and yet an equally important need -financial advice- is being restricted for the most needy while increasing the costs to all. If this is willfully done by the President and you, Mr. Perez, then I hope you are prepared to bear the full weight of the consequences as our President will surely not be willing to take the fall for such a catastrophic outcome.

While convenient to foist this unnecessary rule-making on the financial industry and paint us all as "greedy" and "unfriendly" that is simply not the case. Your poor rule-making, combined with the SEC and DOL's poor enforcement history has led to numerous investor injuries. We all know these rules come from the heels of the Bernie Maddoff scandal. Yet there were rules in place to stop that. They just weren't enforced. Now you want to add even more rules? Rules that will harm the American people who don't want to call a 1-800 or talk to a robot for help? Who cares if their local State Farm agent or Northwester Mutual Life rep can often only use proprietary products to help their clients? There are near enough financial advisors to help everyone as it is. And if these "captive" advisors are good, then the client is still well served. As an independent advisor, I'd rather have to compete against 1,000 great agents from those companies and have the DOL and SEC and others crack down on the independent advisors and captive advisors who are B-A-D. There aren't alot of them, but there are enough to keep you busy without adding more rules and regs that even you cannot hope to enforce.

Randy Bogden FSS, LUTCF
Great Falls, MT
rbogden@mwfbi.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jay Randall Columbus, OH
randall.jay@principal.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Matthew Schultz
Grand Island, NE
schultz.matthew@princor.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

My name is Matthew R. Schultz. I was born and raised in Nebraska. I went to college and worked across the country to come back to Grand Island to help my father with his family owned sporting goods store. I started in the financial industry in college. Left the industry and have returned to the industry to find many good changes and many changes that might have great intent, but could hinder the clients we serve. I commit to my clients to educate them on the fees and different investment options that I provide as well as others can provide. I claim to be one of the few that truly push to help a client make the best decision based on the education I can give them along with the analysis that I provide for them through all of their financial endeavors. Given that I don't charge for these consultations, it is not about the compensation that I write you this letter. It seems to be difficult for people to take the time to plan for their retirement let alone make a budget for their month to month expenses. I teach Dave Ramsey Courses to help much of that. The way that this bill is written would hurt my ability to truly help clients out. I know that this would hurt a lot of others who are in my same profession.

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services. Which will be detrimental for what is already a hard thing to educate the clients that we serve.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL

proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Dwight Lynn
Watsonville, CA
ddlynn@sbcglobal.net
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Sharon Eddy
Alexandria, VA
sharon@sharoneddy.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I am very concerned with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. I support the Department's goal, however, the current fiduciary proposal will have a terrible impact on my customers. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

I work with small business owners who are trying to do the right thing for their employees by offering a retirement plan but affordability is key for them. The majority of my customers are individuals who are mostly of modest means. It is not unusual for my customers to start with $100/mo towards their retirement. I spend a lot of time educating my customers about risk and their risk tolerance, options available, going through suitability, time horizons, and explaining how mutual funds work. Often they know nothing about retirement plans or mutual funds so we have to start with the very basic principles. I tell them to never invest their money in something that they don't understand so we many have a number of conversations before they are comfortable starting to invest.

I work with customers of modest means regarding their retirement because it is important work, not because I make a lot of money from it. Commissions from variable products are less than 1.3% of my earnings this year. The new proposal will more than likely be too costly and difficult for me to continue helping my customers.

According to AARP's fact sheet:

www.aarp.org/content/dam/aarp/research/public\_policy\_institute/econ\_sec/2013/sources-of-income-for-older-americans-2012-fs-AARP-ppi-econ-sec.pdf.

The median income (meaning 50% of the population) for a 65 year old woman is $15,557 a year in 2012 and it is primarily from social security. Because I educate people about retirement options, hopefully my customers will do better then the median income when it is time for them to retire.

As an example, Richard was a mail and file clerk with a Federal agency who recently retired. I worked with him for years prior to his retirement on financial basics like debt management, and emergency savings, and asset allocation and budgeting. Part of his TSP was rolled over into an annuity to supplement his $2400/mo pension. He has sufficient emergency savings now, has some money in a conservative mutual fund, and is almost out of debt. He is happy that he is able to live within his means and has lifetime income streams as well as a small nest egg. He could have never afforded an advisor fee and left on his own without someone to educate him - all of his retirement money would have been spent within 3 years. Under the proposal, Richard would have never received the education that he needed.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement. In my opinion, these fees would impact the number of plans implemented as employers are very concerned with fees.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

John Prokopchak Potomac, MD
johnp@hbeckinc.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ronald Housley
Maplewood, NJ
housley_ronald@nlvmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Barry Johnson
Washington, IA
bjfs@netins.net

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Josh Oswald
Tiffin, IA
jtoswald@hotmail.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Charles Olson
Omaha, NE
charles@ociservices.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Glisel Jimenez ChFC, CLU Raritan, NJ
glisel@gliseljimenez.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Paul Peterson
St. Cloud, MN
pep1956@charter.net
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Cynthia Bong
Hartland, WI
cbong12@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

I believe it is important to encourage all individuals to plan for their future. By making the process more complicated, many may decide to do nothing.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Joseph Roberts
Lincoln, NE
jroberts@midfin.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Gregory Hitt
Venice, FL
gregoryhitt@allstate.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

I work with many small investors to find retirement solutions and have for 30 years without complaint. Because I take time to thoroughly and simply explain their options. My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Bruce Shaw
Marietta, GA
bshaw@holmes-shaw.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for accepting ideas on a best interest standard. Like most professionals in the financial services industry, I'm concerned that the current proposal is flawed and will have unintended consequences. It will leave many without access to professional services which would help them plan successfully for their retirement. Without those services, people would have to make those decisions themselves with no experience or training. Most Americans need help with retirement advice and oversight.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

Please have the Department of Labor re-write this rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Elfredia Hawthorne
Chatham, IL
evh3067@aol.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Sir:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Randy Hall
Bellingham, MA
randall.hall@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Stephen Bergleitner
Bennington, VT
stephen.bergleitner@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Tim Broyles
Jackson, GA
tim.broyles.r1tx@statefarm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

David Mann
Scottsdale, AZ
davidmann@cox.net
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Tom Currey
Grand Prairie, TX
tdcurrey@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Greg Hanlin
Mason, MI
greg.hanlin.b02n@statefarm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Richard Miller
Yakima, WA
richard.miller@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jessica Sundell
Minnetonka, MN
jesundell@metlife.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

James Connole
Clancy, MT
mtagserv@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I have been Licensed for over 38 years and have HELPED hundreds of clients in that TIME FRAME. When WE do NOT give our clients the ability to work whom they TRUST, we are not helping our clients for THEIR GOOD!!!

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Nate Kidd west Jordan, UT
kidd.nathan@principal.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Steve Earhart
Wayne, PA
seat7tr@comcast.net
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a over THREE DECADES, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Michael Gabriel
Monroe, CT
mgabriel@sfg4life.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

George Latiolais
Lafayette, LA
george.latiolais@lfg.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ben Crisologo
Los Angeles, CA
bcrisologo@financialguide.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Gerald Anderson
Missoula, MT
ganderson@ft.newyorklife.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Karl Kniseley III
Woodland Hills, CA
kkniseley@ft.newyorklife.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Daniel Gordon
Brooklyn, NY
dgordon01@ft.newyorklife.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

James Greco
Carmel, CA
greco@jamesgreco.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Scott Schwalbe
Fond du Lac, WI
scottschwalbe@charter.net

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

McKenna Stephens
Scottsdale, AZ
mckenna.stephens@northstarfinancial.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Daniel Wells
Valley Center, CA
dwells@farmersagent.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Sweeta Khona
lake success, NY
skkhona@ft.newyorklife.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Fritz Engels
Kennesaw, GA
engelsfinancialgroup@retirerx.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Heather Bosse
Mt Pleasant, SC
heather.bosse.mdne@statefarm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for years, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education! However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Sue Murphy
Algona, IA
sue.murphy@centralfinancialgroup.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Eric Ruh
Milwaukee, WI
eruh@metlife.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Elizabeth Witzel
Mc Farland, WI
elizabeth.witzel@northstarfinancial.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Francis Pickett
Cypress, CA
jpickett@financialguide.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Nathan Elias
Lincoln, NE
nateelias@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Matthew Ramsay
Gulf Breeze, FL
mattramsay2000@yahoo.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Joe Partise
Seal Beach, CA
joe@jpadvisor.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

John Todd
San Diego, CA
john.toddiii@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Lacey Zumberge
Dallas, TX
lacey_zumberge@glic.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Zach Bradley Canal Winchester, OH
zach@zachbradley.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Rudolph Mahara
Fort Wayne, IN
rusysr@maharawealth.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I have been helping people make financial decisions for over 30yrs. All of my clients recognize the value added my advise has given them. No two clients are the same. They have completely different needs. Knowing their full financial, personal, family, health, and business needs are necessary to give quality advise. Some clients need a complete plan that is fee based. Some need only money management that is fee based. Some need insured products, that have some quarantined benefits. Some need alternative products that can only be offers as FINRA brokerage accounts.

We take our roll seriously. I am already regulated by FINRA, SEC, my broker dealer, my professional organizations, my faith, and my value systems. More regulation is unnecessary and would have the undesired effect of harming the people you intend to protect.

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an

advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Amy Bertle
Denver, CO
amy.bertle@northstarfinancial.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Adam Stone
Grand Prairie, TX
adam.richard.stone@gmail.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Security and Exchange Commission already regulates us fiercely on these issues. I will not be able to provide my members the financial advice they need with these new and confusing rules.

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.
- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.
- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.
- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Cort Otterbein
Birmingham, MI
cort@financialarch.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Buddy Wood
Many, LA
buddy.wood.b276@statefarm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Mary Lyons
Dallas, TX
mlyons@pegplanning.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

robert gosslee
shreveport, LA
robert.gosslee@gmail.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ed Hendricks
Reno, NV
ed@hendricks-inc.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Edward Mullis
Morehead City, NC
mullisjr.ed@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Josh Wilcox
Papillion, NE
jwilcox@aicinvest.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

To whom it may concern:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

William Whitmore, Jr., LUTCF, FSS
Virginia Beach, VA
billpml@aol.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ryan Groce
Westlake, TX
ryan.groce@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Daniel Staub
Oxford, MI
dstaub@sigmarep.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Madison Behar
Raleigh, NC
mhbehar@ncsu.edu
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jacob Rose
Belmont, MI
jarose@financialguide.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

chinelle ton
berverly hills, CA
cton@financialguide.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Edward C Han Sr LUTCF
Chico, CA
ed.han@allstate.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Aaron Countryman
Keokuk, IA
ajcountryman@ft.newyorklife.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

James Green
Grand island, NE
jj@primarkagency.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Theresa Kiihn
Minnetonka, MN
tkiihn@gmail.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

First of all, thank you for your service! I also want to thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Steven Bergee
West Fargo, ND
sbergee@e4brokerage.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Larry Schinke
Hastings, MN
lschinke@metlife.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Norman Kohn
austin, TX
norman.s.kohn@mwarep.org
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Mel Meyers
Dallas, TX
mmeyers@armorwealth.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Sandra Horn
Tucson, AZ
slhorn@ft.newyorklife.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

John Miller
Lake Elmo, MN
jmiller22@metlife.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

DALE ZANK
MARSHALL, MO
dale.zank.b51n@statefarm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Michael Steffens
Waterford, WI
mikesteffens@v3financial.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Mark Miller
memphis, TN
markmiller@aicinvest.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I believe that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with...this is the most troublesome component in my estimation.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

Rest assured that, after a high level of due diligence is completed (due diligence required by my company, or they will not approve a proposed transaction), I make sure that I am making recommendations that are appropriate and suitable for my clients. To do anything else would be career suicide. In its current state, the BIC is completely unmanageable, not so much for its intent, but for the fact that "best" can be a moving target, and what may be best today isn't so tomorrow. An advisor could find himself in violation of the regulation on a snapshot basis, which would render it virtually impossible for an advisor to comply.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

R John Badger
Norwalk, IA
cjbadger@netins.net
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Allan Oxman
Charlotte, NC
aoxman@ffrcharlotte.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Shelley Rowe
Frederick, CO
srowe@generationsfr.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Timothy Reis
West Bend, WI
tim@reisfinancial.net
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Maurice Harbin
Tyrone, GA
martyh@harbinagency.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Clarence Jones
Fernandina Beach, FL
clarence.jones@prudential.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Patricia Matthew
Big Sandy, MT
danpat@itstriangle.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Bob Rauf
Cary, NC
bob.rauf@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Wilfrido Hernandez
Mansfield, TX
wil.hernandez@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Joan L Buchanan CLU (R)
Orlando, FL
buchanan.joan@princor.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Rex Floyd
Nacogdoches, TX
rfloyd@ft.newyorklife.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

John Richardson
Nashville, TN
john.richardson@axa-advisors.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Scot Bolland
Maple Grove, MN
scot.bolland@northstarfinancial.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Shelly Peterson
Bayport, MN
shelly@hanzlikfinancial.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Glenn French
Billings, MT
glenn.french@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors. It really limits the options I can provide my clients and their ability to have more education.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for over 10 years, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Reina Schlager CPA / PFS
fort myers, FL
reinaschlager@ssladvisors.net
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Below is the recommended verbage from my industry association, but here is my personal comment: I am a CPA/PFS and have been advising clients since the 1980s. My clients' needs come first, not my compensation. The ability to design, and then recommend what is felt to be the most suitable result for my client, that also allows a compensation for me to have a livelihood has taken years of study, education, participation in the evolution of different available instruments, etc...

I am a trusted advisor and am flabbergasted that the details of the DOL initiative get into a level of my business that they do not have the expertise to design. Make the penalty and impact for injuring a client SO onerous that the "bad eggs" might think twice about harming a client. Otherwise, I see GOOD advisors ready to leave the business because it will be strangling and impossible to follow the rules AND give best advice to clients.... when the bad eggs will simply continue to break whatever rules exist and are added in the future.

I DO believe in a level of regulation to protect the public. THIS IS NOT THE WAY TO DO IT. PLEASE, vote, not just to delay the DOL FIDUCIARY RULE until the next administration... but vote NO on this one.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Kevin Frost
Herrin, IL
kevin.frost@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

George Beutter Mishawaka, IN
george.beutter@infb.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

James Myers
Sparks, NV
nvjmyers@sbcglobal.net
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Neil Marks
colorado springs, CO
neil.marks@colorado.edu
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

As a young advisor entering the financial services industry, I rely on providing advice to the next generation of retirement savers. Those folks between 20 and 40 years old need to start saving now as pensions are practically non-existent today and social security is most likely not going to be substantially helpful in 40 years. Starting early is the key to success. I will not be able to help people just starting out due to the time intensive nature of these regulations paired with the small balance of a new retirement saver. Account minimums will keep these folks from accessing the help they need. I trust that you will take these facts into consideration if you care for the next generation.

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Corey Fleisner CLU
Germantown, WI
corey.fleisner@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

steven simon burbank, CA
simon_steve@nlvmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Mark Miller
Dallas, TX
mark.miller@northstarfinancial.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Teresa McDermott
Wayne, PA
terrimcdermottpa@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

John W Wheeler Jr
West Chicago, IL
jwwcfp@aol.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Michael Modaberpour
Beverly Hills, CA
michael@financialguide.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jim Geitgey
Springfield, OH
jogetch@aol.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ned Campbell
Muncie, IN
nci5001@comcast.net
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Johnathan Williams
raleigh, NC
johnathan.williams@nm.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

I do not believe that my colleagues and I will be able to effectively help our communities to save and invest if this law is enacted the way it is written.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Brandon Reichert
Pasadena, MD
brandon.reichert@gmail.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jason Brooks
West Bloomfield, MI
jason@brooksfina.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Lars Gallagher
Lincoln, NE
lars.gallagher@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

JAY SCHRODER
BRENHAM, TX
jschroeder@txfb-ins.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Sir:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

THANK YOU,

JAY C. SCHROEDER LUTCF, FSS
SOUTHERN FARM BUREAU LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY
TEXAS FARM BUREAU INSURANCE COMPANIES
1703 E TOM GREEN
BRENHAM TX 77833
O 979 836 5242
F 979 836 0687
C 979 203 6505

Scott Bolitho
New Castle, CO
scottb@glenwoodins.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Recently, I helped a client decide what to do with her 401(k) account when she terminated employment. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for her. I helped her decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet her risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of a variable annuity and a fixed annuity. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that she would instead just roll her 401(k) into a money market or CD and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if she hadn't had access to my services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

William Caplin
E. Longmeadow, MA
wacclu@verizon.net
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Peter Achor
Harrisburg, PA
peter.achor@comcast.net
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing regarding the current DOL proposal on a best interest standard. As a financial advisor, I believe the current proposal is unworkable. It contains provisions that will leave many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice, and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement, meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly, and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules, depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives, and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and allow both captive and independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best-interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Mike Sandoval
Santa Fe, NM
mikesandov@aol.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

David M Dinn
Indianapolis, IN
davidmdinn@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Trial lawyers win at plan participants expense.

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.
- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.
- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.
- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Gretchen Geist
Wasilla, AK
gegeist@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Steven Ruiz
Mandeville, LA
srockruiz@yahoo.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Todd Otto
Dickinson, ND
todd.otto.gzoo@statefarm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I have recently helped a number of customers review options with 401k plans which remain at previous employers. These Retirement Accounts range from a few thousand dollars and up. These folks do not know their options, do not have any idea how much or little risk makes sense for their situation, or what the alternatives are. I have spent quite a bit of time with these folks to complete a Risk Tolerance, Review investment objectives, liquidity needs, and appropriate options including tax consequences of deciding to simply pull the money out of their current plan for daily use. I have received Commission Income from these transactions when the customer decided to purchase from me. The small amount I received for handling such small amounts of funds is far below what I make for other products due to the small account values. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. Without my assistance, the likely result is that these folks I have helped would have been confused and simply pulled the funds suffering income taxes, early withdrawal penalties, and the long term impact of possibly insufficient retirement savings.

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

LeaAnn Moore
Lincoln, NE
lmoore@midfin.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Mark Gardner
Bellevue, WA
mark@medina-financial.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Speaking as a financial planner and investment advisor I believe the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule will cause more financial harm than good for consumers.

Without my help young people especially will suffer financially.

Case in point:

I am currently rolling a 403 (b) into an individual IRA for a young person.

Because the client did not have a financial advisor before talking to me she had kept $4,825 in a money market account for over 10 years. She had no return all that time.

I evaluated her risk tolerance, liquidity needs, personal values and am recommending investment into an American Funds Mutual Fund account.

On my end it's a lot of paperwork. Between the paperwork and my time with the client I will have spent at least four hours of my time which is worth $150 an hour when I am advising my wealth clients.

For my effort my anticipated commission will be about $120 (or $30 an hour).

Helping these young people is more pro bono than profit. I am doing the right thing for them.

If you institute your fiduciary rule on advisors I will never again guide these younger small investor clients. They will be left on their own which means as a class of investor they will not save, invest and grow their wealth nearly as well. They will be cut off from the education, advice and counsel of professionals like myself.

Your interest in protecting consumers from the rare charlatan is noble. But your new regulation will exact too high a price on society at large.

Jude Mertes
Naperville, IL
jude.mertes@countryfinancial.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Kurt Bogseth CFP(R)
Des Moines, IA
kurt.bogseth@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jamie Cox, ChFC
Albuquerque, NM
jamie@accessyourfuture.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Robert Dibley
Santa Barbara, CA
robert.dibley@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

This is not a well thought out proposal and I would ask that you oppose this new rule.

For many participants of 401k Plans the only advice they receive is from me. I encourage participation, I help enroll employees, I help with asset class selection in line with their risk tolerance profile. With this new ruling in place I would be foolish to ever expose myself to fiduciary risk. Employees would NOT receive the help they really, really need. Oppose this ruling, please.

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Chase Brakke
Saint Paul, MN
chase.brakke@northstarfinancial.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Laura Milliorn
Pasadena, TX
lauram013@yahoo.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Terry Headley
LaVista, NE
theadley@headleyfinancial.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Joni Reiling
Webster City, IA
joni.reiling@centralfinancialgroup.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jana Nawrocki
Kasson, MN
jana@jananawrocki.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Christy Neill
Philadelphia, PA
christy.h.neill@ampf.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

This morning, I helped a client decide what to do with her 401(k) account when she terminates from employment this summer. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for the client. I will help her decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet her risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I will receive commissions from the purchase of mutual funds and an annuity. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of these services. The likely result would be that my client would instead just cash out her 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if she hadn't had access to my services.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

GC Stoumbelis
Bolingbrook, IL
gstoumbelis@thgfinancial.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for twenty years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

David J. Funke CLU ChFC
Cedar Rapids, IA
dfunke@thefinancialspecialists.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Stuart Friedman
Irvine, CA
sfriedman@burnhamgibson.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Toni Santaella
Santa Barbara, CA
toni1@sweptwing.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Gary Beall
Cheverly, MD
glbbq@verizon.net
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Recently I just meet with a client who is a single mother of 3. She has some money saved for emergencies and she wanted to do something for retirement. The most that she could set aside is $84 a month. We did a Roth IRA for her. Under the new rules I probably would not have been able to help her because of the cost involved and the liability involved.

Tom Olofsson
chicago, IL
tomolo@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Thomas Schreiner
Westfield, NJ
tschreinerkofc@verizon.net

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Worthy Representatives,

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

This rule will limit the retirees choices of not only which financial strategies they can utilize, but also restrict whom they choose to do business with.

This rule is clearly not in the best interest of the public and should not be passed.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Dan McGrain
Council Bluffs, IA
daniel.mcgrain@axa-advisors.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Steve Rohrig
Omaha, NE
steve.rohrig@mutualofomaha.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

John C. Watson III
Summerfield, NC
jc3@lawson-watson.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ean Lovless
La Canada, CA
eanloveless@earthlink.net
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

David C. Willis CLU ChFC Springfield, OR
david.willis.coq6@statefarm.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Mark Staat
Holland, MI
mark.staat@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Thomas Miller
Billings, MT
tommyjohnmiller@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Lindsey Ericksen
Dillon, MT
laericksen@nyl.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Lance Kroesch
Georgetown, TX
lance.kroesch@suddenlink.net
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kelli Davis
Zionsville, IN
kelli.smith.davis@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Barb Clark
Adrian, MI
barb.clark@kapnick.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Andrew Harrod
Troy, MI
norge96@comcast.net
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

suzanne malm greeley, CO
suzanne.malm@planamerica.biz
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jennifer Lahaie
Fort Myers, FL
jennl@gracetax.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Donald Schleicher
Greenville, WI
don@schleicherfinancial.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I have been working with clients and helping them in their selection of investments, risk tolerance and financial planning for their future. I believe I have helped many stay off of government assistance by saving and investing for their future. I agree that we need to be regulated by the SEC and FINRA. Please don't change rules which will not help, but hurt customers.

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Lauren Davis
OFallon, MO
lauren.n.davis@examone.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jo Steinberg
Brookfield, WI
jo@midlandhealth.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Sharon Walls
Salina, KS
shari@kansasfinancialservices.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Tim Hodnett
Provo, UT
timothy.hodnett@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm concerned about the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. I agree that some in my industry don't always do what is best for the client--either because of ignorance or selfishness. I am concerned because my understanding of the fiduciary proposal leads me to believe that it may not have the desired effect of lowering costs, increasing transparency, and protecting consumers. This rule seems overly complicated and more costly to implement into a financial services professionals practice. As an industry professional I feel the rule will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services, because the "best" industry professionals won't be able to afford to work with small employer's or individuals with small account balances.

I work regularly with employers who need help to implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans. The DOL rule seems to prohibit an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement--meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services structure that is typically more costly than a commission arrangement for small plans and small accounts.

I feel the DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Studies I've read show that plans with advisors who actively work with them have higher savings rates and better average returns than plans that don't. This is because a financial professional encourages employers to set up plans that are attractive to employees, encourages employees to save enough to meet their retirement needs, helps employees feel confident about investing in a way that meets their time horizon and risk tolerance, and helps savers stay invested during tough markets.

The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. I'm afraid that in many cases participants will be left on their own or with just a website that in my experience does not effectively replace a personal conversation.

Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

I work with clients on a daily basis who either can't or won't take the important steps necessary to build their financial security without the help and accountability a retirement plan advisor provides. Since small businesses account for the largest number of plans, I'm worried that little or no help will be available to them at an affordable cost.

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Again, the lack of a viable compensation structure will mean that many of these clients will not have access to quality help.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Also, requiring the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information conflicts with the goal to make this industry more user friendly and less expensive. As a consumer, I find the more "protected" I am by regulations, the more likely it is that I will be berried in disclosures, signature pages, and other information that doesn't help me make the best decision and distracts from the process.

Financial professionals are not getting rich by helping small employers and savers with small accounts meet their retirement goals. As the industry ages, there is a significant effort to recruit new ethical and talented individuals to help their communities bridge the large gap between what is being saved and what needs to be saved to reach financial security. New regulation that creates a substantial burden, discourages the best people from staying in the industry to help average Americans with this critical need.

Thank you,

Elvin Styron
Morehead City, NC
styron@clis.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Evan Smith CLU, ChFC
Charleston, WV
evan.smith@nm.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Lee Moser
Decatur, MI
lee.a.moser@mwarep.org
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

To whom it may concern,

I am writing you in response to the proposal of a new regulation that if put in place will impact my industry in a very negative manner.

If this regulation is put in place this will have a direct impact not only on us in financial services industry but the general public. I have people that I meet with everyday that not only need, but want guidance with their financial plan.

They need the education that we give them on how to invest their money based on their risk tolerance, investment objective, retirement date, etc. Not only that what should they do with their money when they retire? How do they know they have saved enough money for retirement? How do they make it last as long as they do? How do they pass this money tax efficiently to their kids and grand kids?

These are all important questions that need to be answered. This guidance from us allows people to have a peace of mind not only when they are saving for retirement, but when they actually do retire. Without a trusted advisor these questions will not be answered nor will these people get the important help they need and want.

For example, I had a woman that just retired today and her concern is drawing a specific amount of income per month for the rest of her life without running out of money, while keeping some of her money liquid in case of an unforeseen event. I will be able to put a plan in place for her that allows her to live on that income the rest of her life without running out of money and also keeping a portion of her money liquid that will grow with her as time goes on. This plan will be put together with proprietary products. If this regulation is put in I will not be able to be of service to her.

Yes we as advisors get compensated, but it is a by-product of helping people, if this regulation is passed and there are no compensation for setting up and running 401k's, helping set up proprietary products such as IRA's and ROTH IRA's these people will be at a huge disadvantage. You WILL see people cashing out 401k money creating a huge tax liability, you WILL see people not actively managing their money which WILL cause losses in turn affecting their ability to retirement.

If these regulations are put in place this will be detrimental to the everyone, because everyone retires. People that retire with a good advisor retire comfortable or people that retire with regulations like this will retire on hopes and maybes.

Daniel Miller
Red Oak, IA
daniel.miller@voyafa.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Ann Hudson
West Des Moines, IA
hudson.ann@principal.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Greg Johnson
Belle Plaine, IA
gjohnson@tfamail.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Nathan Wittman
Jerseyville, IL
nathan.wittman@countryfinancial.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Amy Byrne
Los Altos, CA
amy@vitamail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

John Kessler bloomfield hills, MI
john.kessler@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Cheri Stanwix
Celina, TX
stanwix@airmail.net
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Joe Goodson
Baton Rouge, LA
joewgoodson@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Sabrina Pritchett-Evans
Kalamazoo, MI
sabrina.pritchett-evans.gh1k@statefarm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Kirt Carstens
Arnolds Park, IA
kirt@kcarstens.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Lisa Shepherd
New Martinsville, WV
lisa.shepherd.bloh@statefarm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Aaron Hatanpa
Mankato, MN
aaronhatanpa@gmail.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Claude Gaujot
Lewisburg, WV
claude@gaujot.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Victoria Quetel
Tucson, AZ
vquetel@ft.newyorklife.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jon Skov
Westport, MA
jon.skov@thrivent.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for four years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Consumers need access to financial planning professionals to avoid costly and irreversible planning mistakes. Although it is sometimes easy to put a price tag on advice when using a commission or fee, it is almost impossible to put a price tag on making a poor, uninformed decision. Just today, I met with Sharon, a pre-retired freelancer. At 61 she felt fairly secure in her retirement, until I began to ask her if she had considered social security election strategies for she and her husband. I also asked if she had identified the level of income she would need in retirement, and how she would use her annuities and investments to provide supplemental income in a way that wouldn't run out. Since Sharon and her husband are healthy, they need to plan to age 90 or longer and carry a significant longevity risk. Sharon hadn't thought about how she would pay for long term health care expenses or the impact that would have on she or her husband even though 50% of couples will need some additional form of medical care later in life. Sharon also hadn't thought about how the inheritance she may receive from her mother might be assigned purpose and factored into her retirement plans.

There is enough on the table already in this one example. So many things for Sharon to think about, so many different strategies and products that can be used to develop solutions, and so many different ways to pay for the advice, guidance, and help. I have received no compensation for sharing my knowledge so far, and may not unless Sharon decides to ask for additional help. Sharon is a simple person faced with a complex situation. To further complicate things under the proposed rules would increase the odds that Sharon would become frustrated and proceed down the road of "no action", which is often the most costly of all. This is by no means an uncommon situation facing consumers today.

Please help remove complexity and other obstacles that further inhibit Americans from engaging with financial professionals.

Johnathan Worrells
Hattiesburg, MS
jborrells@ft.newyorklife.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

"I recently helped a client who had switched companies that he worked for. He had no idea what to do with his retirement assets, and without my help he would have lost around 30-40% of it by just cashing it out. The public needs the services we provide, and I believe this bill will leave our clients in a burden!"

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Joseph Chalom
Coral Springs, FL
joe@retirementcouncil.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

phillip stackowicz Granger, IN
phillip.stackowicz@kofc.org
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Andrew Oman
Crookston, MN
andy@andyoman.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Recently, I helped Sara decide what to do with her 401(k) account when she terminated employment. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for Sara. I helped Sara decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet Sara's risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds and an annuity. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Sara would instead just cash out her 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if she hadn't had access to my services.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Elsie Williams
Meridian, MS
ewilliams@alfains.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Waylon Peterson
South Bend, IN
wpeterson-cuna@tcunet.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

I also think that the proposal needs to go further in addressing one of the biggest fiduciary issues facing retirees and potential conflicts of interest. Please make sure that life insurance agents or anyone who promotes themselves as a financial professional who do not hold securities licenses do not make recommendations to employees to sell the securities in their retirement plans. If you are not securities licensed, you should not give investment advice unless you become securities licensed. Some agents purposely choose to not be securities licensed to reduce the amount of oversight from securities regulators, such as FINRA and the SEC, while continuing to work with employees in the retirement plan rollover market. Also, all states should follow the NAIC 10/10 annuity rule so high surrender charge period and high surrender charge fees are no longer allowed. Finally, all lump sum premium life insurance policies and qualified annuities should have additional scrutiny by tracking the source of funds; when the money is coming from an IRA or retirement plan, the regulators should make sure that only investment professionals who are securities licensed make recommendations to customers to sell their securities.â

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Philip Reiter
Pine Island, MN
philip.reiter@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Vera Stewart
Scherverville, IN
vera_stewart@glic.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I just met with a client last week and she was in tears as she has MBA a retired teacher of 40 plus years, but it was not in financial services. She said it is too overwhelming and she did not know what to do. I immediately try to reassure her that I would educate her on the various decision she had to make. After about 3 hours she was feeling much better. People as a whole do not understand the financial world and I feel blessed that I am able to assist them.

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Leonard Neisler
Fishers, IN
lenneisler@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Charles Giardina
New Orleans, LA
cgiardina@metlife.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Kevin Jones
Galloway, NJ
kjones@brbusa.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Bob Sukolsky, CLU
Indialantic, FL
bob.sukolsky@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

DUANE BIEDE
Hastings, NE
speedybiede@hotmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Dan Rust
Bozeman, MT
dan.rust.b60w@statefarm.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Michael Halloran
Jacksonville,, FL
mike.halloran@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

We have a couple of large 401k's at nursing homes that have about 400 employees each. When we enroll new employees many of them are lower paid and have never invested before. We have been teaching them about their options of the things they could do with their money. Since we have done this the contributions have dramatically increased. This is good for them since they will have more than just Social Security to live on during retirement. If the new regulations go into effect we will not be able to offer that service anymore. The ones who would be hurt the most would be the low income earner.

Please don't let that happen.

Lynn Walstad FIC
Platte, SD
lynn.walstad@mwarep.org
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Steven Brunk
Rockingham, VA
sbrunk@ldbinsurance.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Paul Hudson
Decorah, IA
paul@paulhudson.biz
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Andrew Chymych
Sun City, AZ
achymych@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Chal Daniels
Napa, CA
cdaniels@rr.firstallied.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Wes Wadkins III RICP
Tulsa, OK, OK
wes@orvisandwadkins.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Joshua Sirek
Pierce, NE
jsirek@tcagency.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Ericka Schaefer
Phoenix, AZ
ericka.schaefer@northstarfinancial.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Linda Harris
San Diego, CA
l.s.harris@att.net
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Ted Erck
Houston, TX
tederck@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Owen Wade Roanoke, IN
ofwade@financialguide.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

There are just so many areas that will cause confusion and be detrimental to the consumer; therefore, please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Walter Kuntz
Des Plaines, IL
wkuntz1@comcast.net
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Bruce Murphy
Thornton, CO
bmurphy2@farmersagent.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Pat Clevenger, CLU, ChFC
Coeur d'Alene, ID
pat.clevenger@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Greg Boehne
Rogersville, MO
greg@boehnefinancialgroup.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Tom Schmidt
OKLAHOMA CITY, OK
tom@thomasaschmidt.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

I have been in the financial services business for almost 30 years and have helped numerous individuals with their retirement accounts both while working for an employer who offered a retirement plan as well as when they have left an employer.

Ever since ERISA came into being and individuals had to start becoming more reliant on saving for their own retirements instead of relying on their employers for a retirement income, the need for financial advisers has never been greater. As the vast majority of them for the first time in their lives have had to invest in the stock market and have had no idea or proper education on the risks or different aspects of the market and what it actually means. They just know that they have to put money away. For many their employer is no longer going to provide a retirement income for them and their families.

Yes I have been paid a commission on these cases but the reality is, had it not been for myself or someone like myself helping these very average middle class Americans, they would most likely have ended up in financial disarray or ruin during their retirement years. Instead, for most, guaranteed streams of income have been secured that they cannot outlive thereby reducing the dependency upon the Federal Government. None of that could happen without the financial advice given by an adviser.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisers to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisers from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisers can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an adviser to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisers and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an adviser to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the adviser and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the adviser to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the adviser, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the adviser and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Scott Bennett
Macon, GA
scott.e.bennett@mwarep.org
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

I work with a number of clients who need my advice on options regarding their retirement plans. They need help with investment allocation, beneficiary designations, risk tolerance, budgeting issues and more. I am compensated through commissions when I provide the proper product (i.e. mutual funds, brokerage accounts, managed accounts or annuities) that meets their needs. Your proposal would prohibit me from providing these services.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Robert Petrocelli
Rye, NY
rpetrocelli@ft.newyorklife.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Michael Immel
Fond du Lac, WI
mimmel@ruralins.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Neil Ballotte
Niantic, CT
neil.ballotte@nm.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Akiva Miller
Brooklyn, NY
millera@ft.newyorklife.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Frank Mantay
Jacksonville, FL
fmantay@hotmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez, Senators Nelson/Rubio and Congressman Crenshaw:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a decades or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

I have assisted numerous clients with balances under $20,000 that are bewildered with the options and rules surrounding qualified and non qualified investments. An 800 service doesn't give them the confidence they need to make a decision nor does it provide the accountability to the client that is needed. I need to discover and document the client's situation before making a recommendation, however an 800 number cannot do this and most likely will not do it.

As elected officials, you know the importance and duties that being a representative entails for your constituents. WE feel the same obligation and in the majority (just like our elected officials) perform our duties with high regard to client needs. There are laws and regulations in place to catch the bad actors. By implementing these new DOL rules you will force the majority of Americans to seek help from an impersonal service because they cannot pay an upfront fee for the advice needed.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an

advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Gerry Luczak
Rocky Hill, CT
gerry@luczakins.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Craig Wiklund
Auburn Hills, MI
craig@wiklundandbond.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Leo Strine
Hockessin, DE
leo@financialhouse.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Thomson Chew
Rochester, NY
chew.thomson@principal.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

I help my clients obtain all of the information they need to understand how to plan their financial lives better. This includes IRA rollovers from previous employers, understanding the investment options within their current 401 K/403 B plans as most do not receive any consistent assistance from their employers. Reducing the ability to help and to receive compensation for the work done is not in their best interest.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Gregory Lentz
Rosendale, WI
gglentz@charter.net
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers, of which the majority of my clients are. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Christine Cismoski
Omaha, NE
cgcismoski@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. As a small investor I don't support the new definition of fiduciary at all and would hope you don't as well. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

David Dilley
Holland, MI
ddilley@metlife.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Andy Mongeon
Bismarck, ND
mongeon.andy@princor.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

James Linenger
Brighton, MI
jim@financialarch.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Neven Fox
Kent city, MI
neven.fox@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Joe Duea
Lindenhurst, IL
duea1rep@sbcglobal.net
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Since we have met at a number of civic and Chamber events in Lake County, I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Recently, I helped Kevin decide what to do with his 401(k) account when he terminated employment through a layoff. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for Kevin. I helped him decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet Kevin's risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of a conservative annuity with a lifetime income guarantee benefit. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Kevin would instead just cash out his 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if he hadn't had access to my services.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement. Please feel free to contact me with any questions you may have at 847-445-4395, or duea1rep@sbcglobal.net.

Thredrice Jones Jr.
Ralston, NE
jones.tj@principal.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Robert Redel
Jefferson City, MO
bobkat1955@mchsi.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

J Michael Noonan
Fort Wayne, IN mike@mikenoonan.net
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Last month, I helped Bob M. decide what to do with his deceased wife's 401(k) account when she died/terminated employment.

Bob made a decision to roll the assets from her account into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA). I helped Bob decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet his age, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I will receive commissions from the purchase of mutual funds.

Under the current rule as proposed, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services to my customers. This scenario under the proposed rules will most likely result in Bob taking the cash out as a lump sum from the employer and unwittingly suffer the tax penalties. The service we provide helps folks like Bob avoid wrong financial decisions.

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize.

There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Kerry Schaible CLU CLTC
Cherry Valley, IL
kerry.schaible@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jeff Chernoff
Tampa, FL
jmc@iat.bz

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Clayton Winkler
Lake Orion, MI
clayton@wiklundandbond.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Brian Yeakley
Miamisburg, OH
byeakley@financialpg.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Christopher Mathwig
Savage, MN
christopher.mathwig@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Norman Hines, SR
Kensington, MD
nrhines@msn.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Judith Gregory
Tampa, FL
judy@ltfinancialsolutions.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

My clients are middle class Americans and require products and services that we offer that meet their needs. They need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Michael Bonnell
Gaithersburg, MD
fdcwhc@yahoo.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Fritz Engels
Kennesaw, GA
engelsfinancialgroup@retirerx.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Johnny Johns
Hazlehurst, MS
johnny.johns@sfbcc.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

I am currently working with a couple that has had home, auto and life insurance with me for years. He has decided to retire at age 64 due to some health issues. Even though he has worked with three different companies over the years and participated in a 401k with each employer, he has saved only $140,000 for retirement. He has a very low risk tolerance at his age and has a very limited knowledge regarding investment options. We have developed a plan that will maximize the limited funds available. If this regulation was in place today they would have no one to turn to for advice and recommendations.

I have worked for the same company in the same community in southwest Ms for 35 years. My market is hard working middle income families that trust me for advice. They know for 35 years my advice has always been guided by what I thought was in their best interest disregarding any other factors.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ruth Shannon
Dallas, TX
ruth@babyruth.biz
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Heath Murray
Troy, OH
heath@heathmurray.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Paul Smay
Springfield, IL
pls0868@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Tim Deitemeyer
Fargo, ND
tim.deitemeyer@hotmail.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Andy Mendoza
Scottsbluff, NE
amendoza_47@yahoo.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

David H. Eblen II
Jackson, TN
david@eblenagency.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Lawrence Wiener
Hollywood, FL
lwclu@pensioninvestors.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Michael G. Velasco basking ridge, NJ
mikev@redoakcapitalllc.net
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Joseph Lawler
Wilbraham, MA
jlawler@gaudreaugroup.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

David M. Block, CLTC
Candler, NC
davidblock@insurance-specialties.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Nicole Garcia
Santa Barbara, CA
nicole@dcfis.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Steven Heath
Grand Island, NE
spheath@ft.newyorklife.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

James Glover
White Plains, NY
jim@gloverfinancial.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Doug Dengel
Sparta, WI
ddengel@amfam.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Kerri Davis
Colorado Springs, CO
kerri.davis@horacemann.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Kevin Gates
Lincoln, RI
kdgates@ft.newyorklife.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Roger Gainer
Mill Valley, CA
roger@gainerfinancial.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jeremiah Krantz
GRAND ISLAND, NE
jkrantz@amfam.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

bruce ohrenich
Conshohocken, PA
bohrenich@1847financial.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Kim Bush
Mobile, AL
bush.kim@princor.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for ten years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Edwin McKnight
Murfreesboro, TN
edwin@mcknightfinancial.net

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Terrence Whalen
Cleveland, OH
terrence.whelen@lfg.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Russell Content
Houston, TX
russell.content.ke89@statefarm.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Terri Landry
Abbeville, LA
terri@tlandry.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is UNWORKABLE! The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more [since I have been in business for 41 years], know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers like the "mom and pops" that my business is focused on. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As an example, I recently had Mr. Robert come in as he was retiring and did not know what to do with his 401K monies. After assessing his financial objectives, completing a risk tolerance, liquidity needs and tax considerations he decided to rollover his assets into an IRA. I was able to help him decide HOW to invest his money to meet his goals using the tools that I have readily available. For this I will be paid a small commission on the investments he made. Without my time spent with him, approximately 5 hours from start to finish, he probably would have just taken all of the money out and been penalized 10% plus having to pay taxes immediately eroding what he had worked a lifetime to save for securing his future! This is not the goal of retirement planning that we have worked hard to insure that people understand and engage in.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need MORE, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is NARROWLY defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an

advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Stephanie Tsang
Phoenix, AZ
stephanie.tsang@northstarfinancial.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Stephen Reetz
Sartell, MN
steve.reetz@thrivent.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

From nearly nine years working in this industry, three things are crystal clear to me. First, NEARLY EVERYONE can benefit from professional financial advice. Despite the perception that all the "answers" are readily available on the internet, EVERYONE'S situation is different, and people need help from an outside perspective to figure this out for themselves. They just can't see their blind spots, and most often leave their families in jeopardy.

Second, fee-for service IS NOT NEEDED or DESIRED by MOST CLIENTS! The average person just does NOT want to pay for advice - even though they desperately need it. Forcing this kind of industry environment will create a BARRIER to good, solid advice for the average middle-class person - the exact opposite of the result that you are seeking to gain!

Third, your fear of "predator" advisors, or advisors who make unethical recommendations to benefit themselves is blown way out of proportion. "Captive" advisors - those who can only sell their proprietary products - are offering solutions that are still light years better than the non-planning and inaction route that most clients would fall into. Proprietary products must still be competitive in the open market system, or people just won't buy them, and those companies will not be able to stay in business. Assuming that advisors who sell proprietary products don't have the client's best interest at heart is a tragic error in judgment, and demonstrates a monstrous lack of understanding of the financial services industry, the tremendous need that exists for our services, and the incredible good and value that we provide to our clients.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Dana Reddick
Johnston, IA
reddick.dana@principal.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Debra Webb
Ripon, CA
debra@agentdebrawebb.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

David Edwards
Hershey, PA
davidmedwardsins@comcast.net
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I am in my 33rd year of offering products which include Mutual Funds, Variable Annuities and Variable Life. I have a total of 44 years in the personal and small business marketplace. The current DOL proposals will make it much more difficult to serve many of my clients. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services. American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kasey Morrisey
Burleson, TX
kasey.morrisey@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Amy Duncan
Centennial, CO
amy@alpineplanninggroup.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Todd Hruby
Lincoln, NE
thruby@ft.newyorklife.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

Recently, when conducting a Annual Review in a clients home, a 401k from a previous employer was discovered. My fact finding uncovered that it had been placed in a low yielding money market for many years, and no one had bothered to communicate with them their options. Further the only way to service the account was by an #800 or the internet. My clients are not comfortable with that and prefer a face to go with the name for service on their accounts. Using commissioned products from my company we were able to tailor a solution by rolling to an IRA and adding features and benefits not only not available in the 401k, but in an personal meeting with someone they knew, liked, and trusted from their community. As I under the proposed rules, I would not have been able to do this. My clients would have continued to be in an unsuitable position and suffer financially because of it

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Margaret Benton
Longmont, CO
mbenton@nyl.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Sir:

Recently, I helped Jane decide what to do with her 401(k) account when she terminated employment. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for Jane. I helped Jane decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet Jane's risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds and an annuity. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Jane would instead just cash out her 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if she hadn't had access to my services.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Christopher McConnell
Baton Rouge, LA
chris.mcconnell@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Oftentimes, I meet with clients who extremely confused about the topic of investing. These people are seeking guidance in a crucial area in their financial planning.

Damian Calato
Baton Rouge, LA
damian.calato@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Our clients rely on our professional expertise and service, and without that could incur costly penalties and unnecessary fees without our input and advice.

Steven Needleman
Dave, FL
needlemanfs@aol.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Lynda Turner
Albuquerque, NM
naifanm@outlook.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Timothy OConnor
Grand Island, NE
timo@oconnorandassoc.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Linda Wallace
Long Beach, CA
lwallace@financialguide.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Rick Rice
St Louis Park, MN
rickrice2000@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I am a Pro Choice voter.

When did this administration become an Anti-Choice administration?

The proposed expansion of the Fiduciary standard rule looks like it will severely remove my clients choices (by making options incredibly difficult). Thus the messaging that this is an Unworkable rule change.

Clearly this proposal is political payback to big labor unions so that they can retain Assets Under Management (AUM).

Well I hate to be the one to break the news to you, but the AUM are being managed by Wall Street and this rule proposal will clamp down on competition, thus allowing Wall Street to raise their fees because they know the retirees are stuck to them with bureaucratic glue.

In our free enterprise system, increased competition not only gives our retirement investors more options it also forces the asset management firms to be competitive in pricing their services.

I predict the unintended consequence of this proposed action will be a windfall for Wall Street.

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

David Kaestner
Atkins, IA
ddkaestner@ft.newyorklife.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kathleen Owings
Colorado Springs, CO
kathleenowings@yahoo.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

YVONNE RUNDELL
SAGINAW, MI
yrundel@fbinsmi.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

kurt kechely
Lincoln, NE
kkechely@vsrfin.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Peter Larson, CLU
Elkhorn, NE
goldkey2@cox.net
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Andrew Brown
Grand Rapids, MI
andrew@lakeshorefinancialgroup.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Travis Wendt
Colorado Springs, CO
travismwendt@yahoo.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Philip Ferrara CLU
Canton, MA
pferrara@dmi.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Steve Hampton
Upton, WY
hamptoninsurance@rtconnect.net
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Darren Jackson
Marlinton, WV
darren.jackson.h5ld@statefarm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Vicki Beam
Traverse City, MI
vicki.beam@jwccemail.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Ed Laurienzo
Tallahassee, FL ed.laurienzo@prudential.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Margaret Aldrich
Manchester, CT
maldrich@ft.newyorklife.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

It is all about the problem of well-intentioned legislation and unintended effect on the middle class, widows, divorcees, and pay-check-to-paycheck workers just getting by. If I were to charge fees for my time as a financial professional, I would never have met and educated and assisted the over 80% of my clients who are not wealthy. I helped Pat, a divorcee, make decisions about 401(k) money she was receiving due to her unwanted and unexpected divorce. After reviewing her financial situation, income needs, investment objective and risk tolerance, we set up a rollover to a product that met her needs and her best interest exactly and yes, I received a commission.

Another client of mine, Kathy, was a widow with four young children who desperately needed guidance. Yes, I attended the funeral. We financial professionals don't just open accounts and then just leave clients to fend for themselves, we are there for them at all stages in life, helping them to understand all of their options and educating them. I helped her rollover her husband's retirement plan into an IRA of her own (yes, a product from my company for which I received a commission) and informed her about the significant Social Security survivor benefit that became a significant source of income to keep her children in their many activities and a permit the purchase of a reliable car to drive them in. Requiring a signed contract before giving her any assistance would likely have scared her away from working with me. Then she likely would have cashed out the retirement fund, paying punishing taxes on the distribution, in her panic to provide for her family.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Andrea Williams
Chicago, IL
andrea.williams@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Tina Riffle
Houston, TX
tina@rifflegroup.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Charles McDaniels
Fayetteville, GA
charles@mcdanielsfinancial.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for 20 -30 years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Randolph Gallas
Kettering, OH
rgallas@lfcinsuranceagency.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Steven Miller
Birdsboro, PA
samiller@dejazzd.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Francisco Correa
Grapevine, TX
frankcorrea@allstate.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

I serve customers with their auto and homeowner needs, while performing annual reviews customers want to know what to do with their retirement or 401ks to best meet their retirement goals. They have no idea how their accounts are performing and we educate and suggest to them based on their risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and future goals.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jamie Norvell, CLU, ChFC, CFP

Corbin, KY

jamie.norvell@nm.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I recently had a gentleman come to me not sure what to do with a 401(k) account from an old employer. He is a pharmacist with a family and doesn't have time to research and figure out what investment strategy would be best for him. Together we figured out his comfort level with investment risk and I was able to put together a investment strategy with a large mutual fund company that met his needs with less risk than his 401(k) had been allocated. I did receive a commission from my broker dealer on this transaction and the client has been well served and I'm confident he would not have been able to duplicate this planning on his own or through his former investment accounts.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Lawrence Ganim
Bridgeport, CT
lganim@ganimgroup.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Scott Palmer
austin, TX
scottpalmerbevo@aol.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Bob Noel
Cape May Court House, NJ
bob@bobnoel.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Tom Benisch
Perry Hall, MD
tom.benisch.huxr@statefarm.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Wendy Varnum
Panama City, FL
wendy.varnum@horacemann.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure. I have worked with employees of Bay District Schools in Panama City, Florida for 20 years. I provide in-service and education to all employees regardless of income and savings levels. If I did not offer assistance to them, they would be without any savings and unable to make plans for a successful retirement! Middle America needs face to face assistance with understanding the many complex products available. Please keep them in mind as you move forward with this new rule. I am against the current draft.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Matthew Crandall
Napoleon, OH
matt.crandall@thrivent.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez, Senator Brown, Senator Portman, & Representative Latta:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Richard Marooney
Chaska, MN
rmarooney@metlife.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Bradley Cummins LUTCF
OKC, OK
bcummins@farmersagent.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

E. Bryan McCollum
Walterboro, SC
bryanm@thekeithagency.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Just this past week while I was helping a client that was now retiring at age 67 with his Medicare plans he asked me about what he could do about the $100,000.00 he had in his 401k plan at work. He said that a long time ago after he took a big loss he put his money in the most conservative area he could. He never made up the total he lost but he gained back a lot of it. I explained how he could use short termed fixed annuities with bonuses, use his 10% penalty free withdrawal each year to meet the amount he wanted for extra income each month along with other important details. He and his wife left my office with some brochures and said they would be back in touch. Barely a week later they came back to my office to talk a little more because he said he had not been completely honest with me about his 401K money and that he had a little more than $200,000.00 in his account! We are now working on the details for them. They were very pleased with how I explained everything and made it simple for them to understand.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Just this past week while I was helping a client that was now retiring at age 67 with his Medicare plans he asked me about what he could do about the $100,000.00 he had in his 401k plan at work. He said that a long time ago after he took a big loss he put his money in the most conservative area he could. He never made up the total he lost but he gained back a lot of it. I explained how he could use short termed fixed annuities with bonuses, use his 10% penalty free withdrawal each year to meet the amount he wanted for extra income each month along with other important details. He and his wife left my office with some brochures and said they would be back in touch. Barely a week later they came back to my office to talk a little more because he said he had not been completely honest with me about his 401K money and that he had a little more than $200,000.00 in his account! We are now working on the details for them. They were very pleased with how I explained everything and made it simple for them to understand.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

steven Westrick
Fort Wayne, IN
sjwestrick@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Roger Relfe, ChFC.
Belleville, IL
90degreeswest@att.net
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Edward Carvalho
Merrimack, NH
flyed@aol.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Mathew Driscoll
Cedar Falls, IA
driscoll.mathew@princor.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

This proposed rule would reduce consumer choice. If consumers did not value the advice they receive from their advisors they would fire their advisors and go elsewhere. It is hard to argue that the American financial system does not provide enough choices for consumers when it comes to their retirement savings. The American system provides an almost unlimited array of choices. The current system allows consumer to choose how they compensate the advisor they are working with. In many cases the commission compensation system is actually cheaper than a fee based system. The proposed rule is a giant gift to the Trial Lawyers lobby. If consumers want low cost options there are many, if they want advice consumers are well aware of what they are paying and getting. There is no shortage of disclosure about fees and expenses.

In pushing this proposal forward it should be remembered that more rules and regulations do not stop crooks, because they do not follow the rules and laws. I firmly believe that most advisors have their clients best interest at heart. There are always a few crooks in the crowd and all the laws and regulations in the world won't stop them.

It should be remembered that Bernard Madoff was held to a Fiduciary standard. Simply holding someone to a Fiduciary standard does not change what is in their heart as they work with their clients. As you explore the currently proposed rule please keep in mind that passing more rules does little to help the public. There are plenty of rules in place presently.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Marilyn M Blosser
Miami, FL
mmb@blosserfinancial.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. Not only would the proposal confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships it would grossly interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. In my 40 plus years in this industry I have always put my clients interest above any personal financial gain. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for 25 years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Steve Heinen
Fort Worth, TX
championsins@aol.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

David L Rees Marion, IN
davidrees@allstate.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Leroy Kawai
Rowland Heights, CA
lkawai@pacificbridge.net
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Stephen Howard
Omaha, NE
steve@stevhoward.biz
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

I have about 2000 clients that I meet with regularly to advise them on their financial affairs. Many of them have been my clients for 20 years or longer. Some of them have been clients of mine for over 30 years. They trust me and come to me for advise on financial matters. Most of them have very little knowledge when it comes to mutual funds or retirement planning. If I didn't ask them about their retirement or other financial goals, in most cases, no one else would.

It is imperative that individuals start their retirement planning early and stay with their plan. Many would liquidate their retirement plans when they change employers if it wasn't for my advise. I am able to teach them the importance of retaining their original retirement funds so that they will be able to retire someday, rather that asking for financial aid from the government when they are no longer able to work.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Bryan Oswald
Lincoln, NE
bryan@oswaldinsurance.biz
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Steve Leslie
Seneca, SC
hsleslie@bellsouth.net
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Kyle Lindner
Katy, TX
kyle@insurewithkyle.net
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Lanny Kuehl
Garnavillo, IA
kuehls@alpinecom.net
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Cindy Scheuerman
Windsor, CO
cindy@beemerinsurance.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Clark Snitko
Roseville, CA
csnitko@financialguide.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Doyle A Lowe
Decatur, TX
dlowe@txfb-ins.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Pamela Fugitt-Hetrick
Santa Cruz, CA
phetrick@dcdis.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

WilliamWilliam Darnell
Great Falls, MT
bill.darnell@american-national.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Thomas Newton CLU ChFC
Scotts Valley, CA
thomas.newton@prudential.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

James DiSerio
Stockton, CA
james.diserio@axa-advisors.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Roger McCullough
Fort Dodge, IA
roger.mccullough@axa-advisors.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Amy Ley
Menomonee Falls, WI
aley@wi.rr.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure. I have been in the financial services industry for 23 years. I have an M.B.A. in finance and work in a private wealth management firm in Brookfield, WI with 16 advisors. Collectively we have 332 years of experience in the financial services industry serving over 5000 clients of which are mainly middle income wage earners and small business owners. The DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32) would create a huge impediment for the average investor to seek prudent advice. I urge you to reconsider the proposal and allow professional advisors to continue to assist clients in making prudent decisions with their retirement assets. Yes, we need to get paid for what we do, but the ruling, as it stands is not practical. People are willing to pay for financial advice and the DOL Fiduciary Rule is too stringent and will greatly impair the advisor/client relationship. This ruling is unfair and impractical for the vast majority of financial advisors who, day in and day out, provided solid investment advice to clients. Left to their own demise, most people will make no decision or an improper decision when it comes to the largest basket of money that they've accumulated--their retirement assets. Please allow us to continue to serve clients in this vital area so that clients may continue to receive affordable, prudent advice.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Timothy Dwyer
Milwaukee, WI
tim@gfgwisconsin.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Shane McMahon
washington ch, OH
shane.mcmahob.h3k8@statefarm.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Tamie Schmit
Bismarck, ND
tschmidt1@farmersagent.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Robert Joki
Mountlake Terrace, WA
bob.joki@ingfp.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm adviser-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisers to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients. I was hired, 46 years ago, and the rule was to know your customer, and then do the right thing. WE just had a long time customer retire, and due to their specific needs, we split the 401 K roll over into 3 IRA pieces, so that the disbursement of income, could better fit the pattern of cash flow, that they desired. (we selected a Variable annuity, UIT investment accounts, and an individual stock brokerage account to fit the income pattern that they desired

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Rennae Padderud
Britt, IA
pixie1955@yahoo.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Richard Hoover
Las Vegas, NV
richhoover@msn.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Clifford Sutter
Metairie, LA
cliff.sutter@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

James Goodacre RHU,REBC
Carmel, CA
jgoodacre@sbcglobal.net

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

WALTER OWENS WOLCOTT, IN
weoinc@earthlink.net
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Joseph Ferrara
Ft. Myers, FL
joef@gracetax.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Ashley Corbally
Missoula, MT
ashleycorbally@gmail.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Sagar Khona
Syosset, NY
superkhona@yahoo.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Mike Czapliskie
Bentonville, AR
czaphealthcare@live.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Joseph Murnane
Glenview, IL
hobie.murnane@nm.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

T. Aaron Ostler
Bennington, NE
aostler@heritagefinservices.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Greg Kreiner
Berkley, MI
gregory_kreiner@glic.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

William Bram
Tampa, FL
wbram@msn.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Brad Binversie
Whitelaw, WI
bradley.binversie@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Steven Elliott
Wichita, KS
wichitahealthinsurance@gmail.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Taylor Davis
Lafayette, LA
taylor.davis@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Mike Bottinelli
Portland, OR
fisinc@comcast.net
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

James Scanlon
Nokomis, FL
jscanlon@scanlongroup.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

David Koll
Omaha, NE
david.koll@mutualofomaha.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Pam Herndon
pittsboro, NC
pam@pamherndon.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

George Sutphen
Ringo, NJ
georgesutphen@att.net
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

James Jackson
Auburn, ME
jim.jackson@prudential.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Kent McNary
Fairfax, VA
johnplace4@verizon.net
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Robert G. Land LUTCF, CLTC
Rocky Mount, NC
bobland@lmfs.org
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

mark mischke
st.paul, MN
mmischke@moneygeeks.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Ed Portillo
El Paso, TX
ed@riobravofinancial.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Tricia Seitelbach-Green
Omaha, NE
tricia@vintagefinancialgroup.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services. I have worked retirement savers for over 15 years, and this regulation would confuse investors further, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to complex regulation does not mean I am against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients know I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would not refer others to my firm, and would no longer be my clients. I am concerned about the proposed regulation and its impact to investors when it comes to taking assets from their 401K plans in retirement. Investors need more education on the impact of saving, allocating their dollars and making a plan to distribute that pool of money in retirement. Many will run out of money because of poor planning and failure to understand a reasonable distribution plan. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss these impacts on their individual needs.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL

proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Susan Wier, CFP, ChFC, RFC Bloomington, IN
swier@1stamericantrust.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Les Brackett
Panama City, FL
les.brackett@axa-advisors.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Pat Frappampina
Cornelia, GA
pfrappampina@woodmen.org
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Thomas McCaffrey
Hattiesburg, MS
a023916@allstate.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ed Clink
Milford, MI
eclink12@bbresource.net
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Shimon Kempler
Brooklyn, NY
skempler@thetriangulum.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Troy Shreve
LINCOLN, NE
tshreve@benefit-management.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Peter Friedman
Culver city, CA
pafins@ca.rr.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Dear Department of Labor:

Recently, I helped my client Michael decide what to do with his 401(k) account when he terminated employment. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for him. I helped him decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet his risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Michael would instead have cashed out his 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if he hadn't had access to my services.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Clark Anderson, CLU, CFP
San Diego, CA
anderson.clark@principal.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Todd Grantham
Durham, NC
todd.grantham@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Olan Alsup
Missoula, MT
balsup@mwfbi.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Don Compton CLU Sellersburg, IN
don@compton.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Eric Evans
Kettering, OH
eric@ericevansohio.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Terry Nolan
Kenosha, WI
terry.nolan@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Cort Otterbein
Birmingham, MI
cort@financialarch.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Gary CHARLON
ridgecrest, CA
gary.charlon.b87a@statefarm.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Michael McCoy
Gurnee, IL
mccoy.ins@juno.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Adam Carlat
Phoenix, AZ
adamcarlat@yahoo.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Rick Rotramel
Danville, IL
rick.rotramel@countryfinancial.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Ryan Smith
Erie, PA
ryan.smith@lfg.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jeffrey Garter
Ada, MI
jeffg@coldbrookins.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Larry Redden
Dickson, TN
lredden@metlife.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jim Gulett
Shreveport, LA
jimgulett@aipins.co
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Nick Pate
Kokomo, IN
nick.pate.gckm@statefarm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

dan Bell Rochester, MN
dbell@cobrown.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Ron Osibov
Eugene, OR
ozzeybo@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Robert Latimer
Miami, MO
rjldysart@sbcglobal.net
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Patrick Cummings
Moscow, ID
patrick.cummings@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Adrienne Vidal
Albuquerque, NM
adrienne.vidal@horacemann.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

PLEASE CONSIDER THIS CAREFULLY AS THE CONSEQUENCES AFFECT OUR MIDDLE CLASS SIGNIFICANTLY.

Kimberly Conlee
Roswell, NM
kimberly.conlee@horacemann.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jerry Shapiro
Woodland Hills, CA
jshapiro@psfin.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Michael Markham
Scottsdale, AZ
markham.ins.group@gmail.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Robelynn Abadie
Baton ROuge, LA
robelynn@abadiefinancialservices.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for 37+ years, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients. I am client centric in all insurance and retirement planning work I perform. My clients appreciate the work we do and know that we have their best interest in mind in every task and action. There is no question in my mind that the reason I retain long-term clients is their trust in me.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

The marketplace has been in an uproar with so many changes. People are very concerned with things changing so fast and rely upon us to guide them through the complexities of financial and retirement planning. We are a trusted advisor and no question do we require compensation for our expertise. Allow us to continue our valued work.

Andrew Watkins
Durham, NC
andrew.watkins@nm.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Nissy Morel
Flushing, NY
nmorel@ft.newyorklife.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Rick Shaheen
Romeo, MI
rshaheen@sigmarep.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I have been a financial services professional now for 34 years and counting. I have served individuals at all levels on the wealth scale. I pay attention to the individual needs, goals and objectives as well as risk tolerance for every one of my clients and potential clients to come .

I am able to serve them and their families with a high quality of service and integrity. I am also able to be fairly compensated for the service and products I provide. It has worked well for both sides of the relationship for many years now. I am concerned that continuing to serve them and new clients in this manner will be dramatically impacted with the new proposed rules.

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I sit on the board of the National Association of Insurance and Financial Advisors, (NAIFA-Greater Detroit) as the current President-Elect for 2015. Although I am an Independent Representative, our organization represents all financial advisors, both Independent and Captive agents alike.

NAIFA recognizes the role that all advisors play in assisting the public at large to plan properly and effectively for their financial futures. We also recognize that the vast majority of these advisors have the best interest of their clients at heart and are greatly concerned over doing the proper planning for each of them. A large part of that planning comes into play with an individual's retirement plan as that will make up a large chunk of their future retirement income.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jeffrey Michaels
Raleigh, NC
jeff.michaels@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Roscoe Orton
Rexburg, ID
roscoeorton@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Last week I helped a client establish a SIMPLE IRA. He is over 70 1/2 and does not qualify for a Traditional IRA. He is making income as a piano tuner and as a county commissioner. He also has retirement income from Social Security, and PERSI from his years of teaching school. Since his wife passed away several years ago he has to file singly and really takes a tax hit. He is able to put $1000/month into his SIMPLE. He does not have a large investment portfolio. No registered investment advisor would even take the time to work with him because they can only be interested only in accounts over $250000. If the rule goes through as proposed, I would not likely be able to help this client.

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Kenneth Biederman
Springfield, IL
biederman1949@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Cory Shepherd
Seattle, WA
cory_shepherd@sfgwa.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Mark L. Gurley CLU ChFC
Comstock Park, MI
mark.gurley@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Curt Corrado
Denver, CO
ccorrado@corradoagency.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Robert Quinn
Kensington, MD
rpquinn40541@aol.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Richard E. Cote, Jr. CLUChFC Syracuse, NY
rccote@metlife.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

John Mileham
Woodcliff Lake, NJ
rupportj@optonline.net
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jay Kolka
Schaumburg, IL
jay.kolka@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Lawrence Holzberg
Commack, NY
lawrence_holzberg@wagroupllc.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Mark Hale
Vinton, VA
mhale@navfin.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Alex Hanson
The Villages, FL
ahanson@aaasouth.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Michael Collins
Terre Haute, IN
michael.collins@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Roger Colchin
West Columbia, SC
rcolchin@hotmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Norman Giroux
Corona Del Mar, CA
bekam07@aol.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Debra Smith
beaver dam, WI
debra.smith@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Robert Gillespie
Wabash, IN
bobinesg@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Alan Jordan
Neosho, WI
alan.jordan.sjrm@statefarm.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Julian Good
New Orleans, LA
julian.good@goodfinancialgroup.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

One of my clients is a hospital with a 403(b) plan that has been in effect for over 30 years. I have spoken with many employees readying for retirement, who would have no idea what their options are if not for me. The hospital cannot give advice and many are low and middle income wage earners who have no access to advice otherwise. Many cannot operate and do not own a computer either. I've helped many of these folks figure out what to do and they have always been thankful for the advice.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Wayne Whitemore
East Northport, NY
wayne.whitemore.j6g9@statefarm.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Matthew Edelstein
Glendale, WI
matt@matthewedelstein.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Kevin Heinrich
Omaha, NE
kheinrich@financialarchitects.us
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Greg Nelson Sandy, UT
gregmarlene02@yahoo.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Kristy Cavanaugh
Grand Island, NE
kcavanau@amfam.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

MARV THOMAE
laporte, IN marv.thomae.gw4z@statefarm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Peter Chadwick
grand rapids, MI
petec@pinnacle-wealth-advisors.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

DANIEL DEPALMA
VERMILION, OH
dan@dandepalma.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Nathan Kohuth
Cary, NC
nathan.kohuth@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Implementing these changes will create a disincentive to engage with more clients. Clients, both with a high net worth and low net worth, deserve to be serviced appropriately. This regulation will cause the lower net worth clients to be avoided by advisors not wanting the fiduciary responsibility for a small transaction.

The proposal may be written with good intentions however good intentions do not guarantee a positive outcome. Please take time to consider the big picture consequences and cause/effect of this proposal.

Thank you for your time!

Aaron McDonald
Commerce Twp, MI
aaron_mcdonald@glic.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Michael Sieler
Omaha, NE
mike.sielier@curnesgroup.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Debi Walters
Wichita Falls, TX
debi.walters@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Justin Limmer
Tucson, AZ
jblakel8@yahoo.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Bruce Donlan
HILLSBORO, WI
brucedonlan@aol.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Brian Dawson
Bear, DE
bdawson@bdfwealth.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Timothy Gantt
Greenville, SC
tjgantt@ft.newyorklife.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Wm Orie Knowlton III
Winfield, AL
knowltonins@centurylink.net
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

James Fullmer
Holladay, UT
james.w.fullmer@gmail.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Eric Hudson
Janesville, WI
ehudson@ruralins.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Timothy Simmons
Elkhorn, NE
tsimmons@mcgillbrokerage.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Lori Gartner
Kearney, NE
lori.gartner@wfadvisors.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Scott Shaw
Atkins,, IA
sshaw@ft.nyl.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Steven Van Scoik
Elkhart, IN
steve@holmesinsurance.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Tallie Young
Sachse, TX
tallie@tallieyoung.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

