The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Donna Mohrmann
Bloomington, MN
mohrmannrd@usfamily.net

07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Brendan Pheasant
Austin, TX
brendan.pheasant@mwarep.org
07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

I have been working in the industry for 7 years and am working towards my CFP designation which will allow me to become an IAR for my firm. I believe this will make me a better advisor for my clients. My understanding is the changes being proposed seek to have this level of standard applied across the industry.

My big concern is for the small investor, the blue collar worker family, and especially the younger generation graduating with crippling debt loads. I can tell you most of these clients are not going to pay a fee for advice and they are the ones that really need it. Think about it, how many non business owner electricians, plumbers, recent college graduates, or even first generation college grads from low income families do you know that have gone and paid an attorney $750 to do their will, HIPAA release documents, final directives to physicians? This is BASIC. The same people will not go pay an advisor that same fee to help them with their $2k rollover from their 401(k) and will cash it out or let it default into a money market fund with some third party company. Many of these clients I make far less money on than I believe my time is worth, but I believe it is the right thing to do. Please do not make it harder than it already is to help these people.

I agree that a lot of people are taken advantage of and this needs to be fixed, but if you are not careful I think you will drive financial advice the way of attorneys - out of reach, intimidating, and foreign to the normal American.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jason Jones
Providence, UT
jason@cache-financial.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jon Lawson
Brentwood, TN
jon.lawson@nm.com
07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Mike Corry
Ladue, MO
corrym@toddog.org
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

James Stearn
Fort Walton Beach, FL
jestearn@yahoo.com
07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Van McClain
Cordova, TN
vmcclain@metlife.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Eric Obergfell
Highlands Ranch, CO
obergfellea@yahoo.com
07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Micaela McKenna
Bozeman, MT
micaela@mckenna-financial.com
07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to

discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Daniel Buzzanca
Garden City, NY
dbuzzanca@financialguide.com

07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Shaina Barman
Cross Plains, WI
shaina.a.barman@mwarep.org
07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Hello,

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to

discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jason Schultz
Jackson, TN
jason.schultz@nm.com
07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to

discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Troy Hokeness
Sioux Falls, SD
hokeness.troy@principal.com
07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to

discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Benjamin Wright
Cordova, TN
benjaminwrigh@financialguide.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

James Frank, CLU
Tallahassee, FL
james.frank@axa-advisors.com

07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Derek Bohne
South Jordan, UT
derek.bohne@allegisag.com

07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Barry Delp
Davenport, IA
barrydelp@gmail.com
07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jill Mahler
St. Louis, MO
jmahler2021@aol.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Missouri Leaders:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Lynda Baccoli
West Orange, NJ
lyndab@wsvogel.com
07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Cris McBride
Littleton, CO
cmcbride@nfpsi.com
07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Chuck Wierschem
Germantown, WI
chuck.wierschem@nm.com

07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Joseph Van Parys
Scottsdale, AZ
joevanparys@gmail.com

07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Davey Gaddy
Clarksdale, MS
dgaddy@ft.newyorklife.com
07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Stephen Harris
Memphis, TN
stephen.harris2@axa-advisor.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Michaele McGreevy-Lawler
Sioux Falls, SD
michaele@mcgreevyassoc.com

07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Orvel Jackson
West Palm Beach, FL
orvel.jackson@prudential.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Stephen Harris
Richardson, TX
steve@stevharrisassociates.com

07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Michael Rogero
Saint Johns, FL
mrogerosr@gmail.com
07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

I am now helping a client to set up a 401(k) account. The decision was made for existing 401-K accounts to be rolled over into the new 401-K. I am helping these participants decide how to invest into the 401-K account to best meet their individual risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs. I will receive a 1 % fee for my work. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that this client would instead just not set up a 401(k) for their employees and they would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty by taking existing IRA funds that they could rollover into the 401-K, a wrong decision but one likely had they not had access to my services.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Roger Tuttle
Edenton, NC
tnega@aol.com

07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Brian Cornelius
New Orleans, LA
brcornelius@gmail.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jan Spalding
Clayton, MO
jan.spalding@me.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Keith Phillips
Moorhead, MN
kap1520@gmail.com
07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Richard Potter
Kingsport, TN
richard.potter@aig.com
07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Debbie Kohlenberger
St. Louis, MO
debbie@innovativebrokerage.net
07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Michael Ledford
Chattanooga, TN
mike@ledfordplanningservice.com

07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Loretta Jennings
Moss Point, MS
loretta.jennings.b2ju@statefarm.com
07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kate Nguyen
Tampa, FL
kate1nguyen@gmail.com

07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Robert Styrkowicz
Lake Villa, IL
bobs@allstate.com

07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Drucilla Andrews
Mechanicsville, VA
dandrews@belmanklein.com
07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Roger Andrew James
Anderson, MO
rajames@metlife.com
07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Philip Winkler
hackettstown, NJ
pwinkler@nlvmail.com
07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Steven Saladino
Tampa, FL
saladino@verizon.net
07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

As always, I am available to share my 25 years experience with you as it pertains to this matter and affects 99% of my past and current middle America personally and financially responsible clients.

Many of my clients have decided to send their thoughts to you as well.

Patrick Hall
Monument, CO
patrick@patrickhallagency.com
07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Heather Graham schmidt
Saint Louis, MO
heather@ebenefits-inc.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Rob Williams
Memphis, TN
robwilliams@irongatefm.com
07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Christopher Lowery
Fairview Heights, IL
chris.lowery@nm.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jeff Tveit
Chamberlain, SD
tveit@midstatesd.net
07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez,

Thank you for seeking input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is not in the best interest of the US citizens. The proposal has provisions that will leave many retirees without access to the education and advice they need.

I was an elementary teacher for 24 years. Most of my clients express to me they have not had their finances explained so well to them at their level before meeting with me. We want our citizens to retire with a firm financial standing. If they do not have good education from local advisors who they trust this will not happen.

Every day I am working with members of our community. They thank me for helping them to make the right decisions for their retirement. Without this advice they would not be prepared for the retirement they desire and deserve.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Myles Huether
Rapid City, SD
myles.huether@thrivent.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Gary Shickora
Mullica Hill, NJ
gary.shickora@nm.com

07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

steve ruckart
murfreesboro, TN
sruckart@raiadvisors.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Katheryn Keller
Santa Barbara, CA
katheryn@dcfis.com
07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Recently, we helped a client decide what to do with her 401(k) account when she terminated employment. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for her. We helped her decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet her risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. We received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds and an annuity. Under the current rule, we would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that she would instead just cash out her 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if she hadn't had access to our services. PEOPLE NEED OUR HELP and we deserve to be compensated fairly.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement. In an age where people can find practically anything for free online, they are less likely to pay a fee for this service and will lose the priceless advice we offer.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Butch Ferdinandsen
Lake Charles, LA
dferdinandsen@gmail.com
07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Catherine A. Carlson, LUTCF
Covington, KY
cathy.carlson@kyfb.com

07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Christopher Anderson
Salt Lake City, UT
christopher.anderson@copperpine.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Allison Anglace
North providence, RI
allison.anglace@hotmail.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Keith Van Dell
River Falls, WI
keith.vandell@northstarfinancial.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Matthew Short
Saint Peters, MO
mshort_24@yahoo.com
07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Richard Williams
Savannah, GA
rawilliams@bwcco.com
07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

LeVar D. Thompson
Kaysville, UT
levarthompson@juno.com
07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jeffrey Kammeraad
Holland, MI
jeffkammeraad@financialguide.com
07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Dennis Drake
Bellefonte, DE
dennisdrake@verizon.net
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

David Biondo
Florissant, CO
dbiodno@wildblue.net
07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jay Crowther
Salem, UT
jaycrowther@allstate.com

07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jay Lipman
West Islip, NY
jay.lipman@nm.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jonathon Anderson
Atlanta, GA
cal@fnaplanners.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ryan Harris
Quinton, VA
ryan0407@gmail.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Tom Nelson Utica, NY
tom@nelsonfinancialgroup.net
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Denise Maleski
factoryville, PA
denisem@dgkinsurance.com

07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Timothy Shedler Orchard Park, NY
sshedler@msn.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Steve Rowan
St. Paul, MN
steverowan88@gmail.com

07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

This new rule will significantly harm investors. Without guidance from financial professionals people will be lost in knowing what their options are and how to create a sound financial strategy. I have over 400 clients and I have worked with numerous of them to educate them on risk and how it pertains to their investments. Most novice investors think that their investments are safe whereas there is usually an inherent amount of risk. The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data

retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Lawrence Chalson
Garden City, NY
lchalson@financialguide.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jerome Prentice Burke, VA
jerry@prenticegroup.net
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Mark Powell
Ashland, NE
mpowell@ft.newyorklife.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

David Washburn
memphis, TN
david.washburn@american-national.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Maria Zakutny
BEAR, DE
jmozakutny@verizon.net
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

I have all the licenses and operate as a fiduciary to my clients. However, I currently have no fee based clients, which I am in the process of trying to transfer. I must tell you that it is extremely difficult. The rich can afford it so they don't mind, but that is not my target market. Just yesterday I had to call a 25 year old client and let them know that I no longer work on a commission basis, in which case they would have to pay for my time to advise them. While the end result is they may end up saving money in commissions, they would have to write me a check as opposed to having it automatically come out of their investment. Clients on budgets can't afford that option, even when it is better for them. Please help us find a middle ground.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

John Courtney
EAST LANSING, MI
jrc.pfs1@yahoo.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Mac Bree
Newark, DE
mac.bree@dsfg.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Lisa Reynolds
Poplar Bluff, MO
lisa.eynolds@mwarep.org
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Paul B Winn
Chesterfield, VA
history4145@outlook.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Brian Holmes Advisor
Atlanta, GA
brian.holmes@peachtreeplanning.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

While I agree with the Department of Labor's goal with the proposed fiduciary rule, I fear that the unintended consequences of its implementation will leave many people without access to professional advice. A majority of Americans need direction with IRA and retirement decisions. By implementing this rule as is, what will actually happen is that advisors will be forced to ignore middle-class Americans, not to mention lower-middle-class Americans, where the most direction/advice is often needed. The reason this will happen is because folks with $100K of household income bristle at paying a fee for consultation. Along with that, an already paperwork-laden industry will become even more cumbersome. Therefore, advisors will be forced to look to higher income and asset households to stay in business. So, the goal of helping the most Americans will backfire, and they will be left to fend for themselves.

Additionally, employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Felicia Butler
Los angeles, CA
felicia_dominguez@us.aflac.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Kathryn Wiegrefe
La Crosse, WI
kathryn.wiegrefe@mutualofomaha.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Eleanor Blaylock
Oil City, LA
elli@burkeinsurance.net
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ray Dunn
Jackson, TN
ray.dunn@nm.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Matt McKenna
Richmond, VA
matthew.mckenna@axa-advisors.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Hardik Shah
Bear, DE
hardik.shah@dsfg.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Daniel Peterson
Fargo, ND
dpeterson@e4brokerage.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As an independent advisor, one of the benefits that our clients appreciate most is the choice that we bring to the client and their retirement savings and investment goals. As the rule is written, clients who have benefited by moving their investments from their company 401k after they terminated their employment, which offered limited options to manage risk in their retirement years, to a diversified portfolio that helps them reduce risk, would be severely impacted.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Paul Dougherty
Upper Marlboro, MD
paul@doughertyagency.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. Having met with some of your staff, I understand how dedicated your team is to provide support to American investors and families in preparing for retirement. However, I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Despite perhaps the best of intentions, the clients I serve in the middle and lower income market in suburban Maryland will be adversely affected by this regulation in its current form. Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Edward Matthes
Oconomowoc, WI
ed.matthes@mutualofomaha.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Brad Hall
Florence, AL
brad@bradhall-llc.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Trevor Roberts
Midlothian, VA
trevor.robers@axa-advisors.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Richard R. Damico
Garden City, NY
damico14@verizon.net
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Peter Glassman
Arlington, VA
pglassman@arxwealth.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Below this paragraph you may recognize the form nature of the letter. So, first, please know that I am an advisor with 28 years' experience in the Washington, DC area. The majority of my clients regularly request my guidance for their 401K's and IRA's. It would be very difficult to do a good job for them without considering all assets. Without help, many people neglect to give these accounts attention. I am just a few blocks away if you would like to discuss this with someone who regularly deals with people who would be impacted. I can be reached on (202)223-8989 and would be happy to meet.

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.
- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.
- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.
- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Nick Davidson
Stewartville, MN
nick.davidson@fbfs.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Brad Greenbaum
West Caldwell, NJ
brad.greenbaum@altigro.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Fonda Devrow
Jackson, MS
fondadevrow@gmail.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Fred Day
Cicero, IN
fred.day@ciceroinsuranceplans.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Charles Cole, Jr.
Elkton, MD
ccole@financialguide.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Audie Levron
Thibodaux, LA
alevron@metlife.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

: Recently, I helped a client decide what to do with her 401(k) account when she terminated employment. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for the client. I helped the client decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet their risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds and an annuity. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that the client would instead just cash out her 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if she hadn't had access to my services.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.
- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.
- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.
- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

David Ferguson
Dalton, GA
aubieferg@aol.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Joe Marullo
Houston, TX
joe.marullo@att.net
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Peter Krantz
Newport News, VA
prkrantz@ft.newyorklife.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Bernard Tomaino
Pearl River, NY
btomaino@allstate.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Karen Hammond
Falls Church, VA
karen@hammondagency.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. The proposed provisions will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Rose L. Goheen CLU
Virginia Beach, VA
rose.goheen.bvwr@statefarm.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Chrystin Williams
Richmond, VA
cwilliams37@metlife.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

John Sullivan
Savannah, GA
jdsullivan@ft.newyorklife.com

07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Craig Stockel
Lindstrom, MN
craig.stockel@thrivent.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Mark Skubic
Savage, MN
mskubic113@gmail.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Lori Gubash
Woodbury, MN
lorig@newmanltc.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Darren Fincher
Amarillo, TX
darren.g.fincher@mwarep.org
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Robert Roth
West Hartford, CT
bob.roth@nm.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Thomas Haughey
Chino, CA
tom@haughey.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Wm. Jason Hagerman CFP CLTC
Newark, DE
jason.hagerman@dsfg.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Joshua Shaver
Newark, DE
joshua.shaver@dsg.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Debra Shears
North East, MD
shears225@comcast.net
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

LAWRENCE BADEAUX
PRAIRIEVILLE, LA
lbadeaux@sfbcc.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Michael Farrell
yorktown hts, NY
mfarrell@metibp.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Monica Murphy Bay Shore, NY
monica@monicajmurphy.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

James Davis
East Greenbush, NY
jamesldavis4@gmail.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Russ Ross
Arlington, TX
russ@russ-ross.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Sebastian Mazzotta
EAST MEADOW, NY
sebastianmazzotta49@gmail.com

07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Stephen Fisher
Henrico, VA
steve.fisher@vamllc.com

07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Paul Adams
New Milford, NJ
padams@natfin.net
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Pierre Bourg
ROSWELL, GA
peterbourg@ashfordadvisors.net
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Isaac Onu
atlanta, GA
iponu@ft.newyorklife.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Van Perry
Scarborough, ME
van.l.perry@mwarep.org
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kerry Niece
INDEPENDENCE, MO
kjniece@gmail.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Michael A Ryan, CFP
Kingston, NY
michael.ryan@ceteranetworks.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Lindsey Cuneo
Alexandria, IN
lindsey@lindseycuneo.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jay Milbank
Cicero, IN
jayd.milbank@ciceroinsuranceplans.com

07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Craig Forbes
White Plains, NY
craig2.forbes@prudential.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jeffry Rosen
Lake Success, NY
jmrfinancial@aol.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Mario Pitchon
Tenafly, NJ
mpitchon@strategiesforwealth.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Michael Smith
Harrison, NY
michael.smith@rampartlife.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

john howe pittsford, NY
jhowe@aicinvest.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Chris Pirtle
Silver Spring, MD
pirtlecm@aol.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Bridget Smith
Spencer, WV
bsmith1321@yahoo.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Perry Moses
Jonesboro, AR
perry.moses@nm.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Linnea Sodergren
Minnetonka, MN
linnea.sodergren@thrivent.com

07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

James Traylor
Rochester, NY
jtraylor@upstatesnp.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

James Grogan
Menomonee Falls, WI
james.grogan@nm.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jeffrey Blanco
Middletown, NY
jblanco@ft.newyorklife.com

07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

James B. Hancock
Marcell, MN
jbhancock@excite.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Dekontee Sinclair
Jackson, TN
dekontee.sinclair@mwarep.org
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Thomas Simpson
Chesterfield, VA
tomsimpson@ft.newyorklife.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Francis Surette
Falls Church, VA
fsurette@financialguide.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

I have been a financial advisor for over thirty three years. You cannot begin to appreciate the lack of financial understanding from the general public. The errors they contemplate making have caused me to shudder. I have saved numerous families from unexpected financial tax burdens due to their misunderstanding about how financial products work.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers

and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Howard Inman
Middletown, DE
h.inman1@verizon.net
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Saleh Yadgar
Albertson, NY
skyadgar@yahoo.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Douglas Threlfall
Middletown, DE
douglasthrelfall@gmail.com

07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

SAM DAWOOD
Duluth, GA
samdawood786@gmail.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

walter Mitchell
Kingston, PA
walter@mitchellfinancial.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Vince Lockhart
Suffolk, VA
vince.lockhart.bfb6@statefarm.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Arcadio Csillas
New York, NY
casillas@prefgroups.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Hanna Severson
Eden Prairie, MN
hanna.severson@nm.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Raymond Bree
Newark, DE
ray.bree@dsfg.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

David Beauchamp
Marietta, GA
david@beauchampbenefits.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jeff Layne CLU ChFC LUTCF
N. Chesterfield, VA
jeff_layne@yahoo.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Thomas MacDonnell
Williamsburg, VA
tmac@jfgonline.net
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Joshua Satzer
Madison, WI
satzerj@consultant.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

We provide a service for our clients who need a professional's assistance in terms of making financial decisions. Without our help, many clients would not be informed about all of the legal and tax changes each year. This could lead to inappropriate decisions that are not in the clients' best interests.

Wayne Morgan
Dix Hills, NY
wmorgan02@ft.newyorklife.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Bryan Sweet
Fairmont, MN
bryan@sweetfinancial.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Peter Bradshaw
Wilmington, DE
peter.bradshaw@dsfg.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

I guide numerous clients daily on what to do with their current/old 401(k) accounts. More times than not it makes more sense for clients to roll their 401 (k) plans to an IRA once they sever services from their existing employer. I help clients to invest the IRA account to best meet their risk tolerance and future income needs. I receive fees and commissions from the work I do with all of my clients. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any such services. The likely result would be that my clients would instead just cash out her 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if she hadn't had access to my services.

Timothy Hayes
Augusta, GA
tbh1003@aol.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Ben Prudhomme
Memphis, TN
ben.prudhomme@nm.com

07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

R.Terry Lawson
N. Augusta, SC, SC
terrylawson@dhbailieagency.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Robert Harbison
Rome, GA
rob.harbison@peachtreeplanning.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Rudy Pope
Savannah, GA
rudypope@nyl.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Christopher Fines
Spotsylvania, VA
christopher.fines@axa-advisors.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

christina mavoides
new windsor, NY
marule12@yahoo.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Randy Schuster
Rochester, NY
randy@coordinatedplan.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Andrew Stauff
Minneapolis, MN
andrew_stauff@fosterklima.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Nick Vali
Middletown, DE
nick.vali@live.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Joe Haman
Fargo, ND
josephhaman@financialguide.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

For example, I recently met with an individual who was laid off from his job in the oil field. When he met, he had told me that he was glad we were meeting because he didn't know what he should be doing with his 401k from his job he was just laid off from. After finding out that his objective with this money was still for retirement, I helped my client decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet his risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds and an annuity. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Steven Zenk
Albert Lea, MN
steve.zenk@thrivent.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Lizzu Castaneda
Edina, MN
lcastaneda@financialguide.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Mike Herrington
Evans, GA
hfs30907@comcast.net
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Ashish Tomar
Woburn, MN
atomar@tomarandassociates.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Brian Casey
Buffalo, NY
bcasey@ft.newyorklife.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Eric Pyles
Chandler, AZ
epyles@htk.com

07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Vincent Dallo
Rochester, NY
vdallo@ft.nyl.com

07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Judy Ringler Mountain
Mankato, MN
judy@mountainfg.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Christopher Sloan
Rochester, NY
csloan@centrafg.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Joanne Squires
Geneva, NY
squiresj@ft.newyorklife.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Gary Fischer
Round Round, TX
gfischer@nationalwesternlife.com

07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Bill Engles
FORT SMITH, AR
billengles@sbcglobal.net
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear All of You:

I was in the business of helping some 500 people with their financial problems. I never had a client lose money... That is, if they took my suggestions. However, because of all the rules and regulations, I pulled out some years ago... Now, you guys and gals are going to make it even harder to help people.

Yes, I know there is a batch... mostly BIG guys... who really screw these old people. I know, I'm one of them. Between an ex CPA and a big financial firm, they cost me almost $400,000... all my retirement....I had to go back to work... At 50, I went to college, and got every degree I could... I said.... "NEVER will I let someone screw me again... or anyone else, if I can help it." Well, I've done that for 25 years....

Well, do what you will... I'm out of it now.... I'm still helping these old people with their problems.

As you know, If you are old and poor, no one wants to help you... (I was there from birth to 18, and I know.) If you are old and rich, they will HELP you out of your money....

I know your job is tough... and getting worse... and I'm proud of all of you...

Bill Engles
Fort Smith, AR

Rod Parker CFP
Jackson, TN
rod.parker@nm.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Milton Edgren
Golden Valley, MN
milt@woodhillfinancial.com

07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Neil Stalter
Newark, DE
neil.stalter@dsg.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ian Richardson
Evans, GA
iraflac@aol.com

07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Caitlin Giovannetti
memphis, TN
caitlin.giovannetti@gmail.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Fred Russell
Binghamton, NY
frussell@htk.com

07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Patrick Underwood
Conesus, NY
punderwood@metlife.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jeffrey Albin
Plymouth, MN
albin.jeff@gmail.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Brian Blasczyk Grafton, WI
brian.blasczyk@nm.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Representatives, Perea, Grothman, Johnson, and Baldwin

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, AFORDABLE retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. Meaning advisors will not give advice to clients.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Brian Kazinec
Atlanta, GA
brian.kazinec@prudential.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Chan Cabe
Carnesville, GA
wccabe@gfb.org
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Robert Rudman
Milwaukee, WI
robert.rudman@nm.com

07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Michael Goldfeder
Floral Park, NY
goldfedm@gmail.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Frederick P. Davies
Syracuse, NY
mail@davies-law-firm.com

07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Robert Vandy
Ballston Spa, NY
rovand1@yahoo.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting clients first. My clients, and our agents' and brokers' clients, many of whom we have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that we have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be our clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Lawrence Van Wie, Jr
Syracuse, NY
lawrence.j.vanwie.jr@mwarep.org
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jeffrey Nagel
Rochester, NY
jnagel@mitchell-nagel.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jason Packer
New Windsor, NY
jpacker@ft.newyorklife.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

JAMES CERONE
Rochester, NY
jcerone@centrafinancialgroup.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jeff Picco
Arden Hills, MN
jeff.picco@countryfinancial.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Joseph Cuchna
Eagle Bend, MN
josephcuchna@midwestinfo.net
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Christopher Mathwig
Savage, MN
christopher.mathwig@gmail.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jeremy Folland
Hallock, MN
jeremy.folland@thrivent.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Leonard Cohen
Bellmore, NY
leonard_cohen@fhfg.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jack Cunningham
Newnan, GA
jacknkim@hotmail.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Warren Aiss
Peekskill, NY
waiss@ft.newyorklife.com

07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

david schnall
dewitt, NY
david.schnall@prudential.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

George Yackulic
South Portland, ME
gsyackulic@ft.newyorklife.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Patrick Kohler
Brookfield, WI
patrick.kohler@nm.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Edward Murray
valatie, NY
edmurray@ft.newyorklife.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jeffrey Payne
melville, NY
jlpayne@ft.newyorklife.com

07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Elizabeth Bauer
Troy, NY
erbauer@thedfgroup.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Akram Abbassi
saint james, NY
aabbassi@ft.newyorklife.com

07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Beth Fahning-Hanggi
Deer River, MN
rbhanggi@arvig.net
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Gordon Struss Jr
Eagan, MN
gtstruss@gmail.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Beth D. Jones CIC
BLaine, MN
beth@fcinsure.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Robert Basiri
Chestnut Hill, MA
rbasiri@centinelfg.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Shaun Jones
Newark, DE
shaun.jones@dsfg.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

As stated below the proposed regulation will cause fewer people to get good advice. It will increase the minimum account size of the people that get advice, leaving the people that need the advice the most in the dark.

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Matthew Banzhaf
West Des Moines, IA
mbanzhaf@metlife.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Marc Lewis
Smyrna, TN
mlewis3@farmersagent.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Buddy Wood
Many, LA
buddy.wood.b276@statefarm.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kylar Miller
Baton Rouge, LA
kylar_miller@glic.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Paul Petersen
MANKATO, MN
papetersen@ft.newyorklife.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Robert Snidow
midlothian, VA
rsnidow@capfs.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Tyler Furger
Minneapolis, MN
tfurger@financialguide.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Christopher Shuck
Woodbury, MN
cshuck@financialguide.com

07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jonathan Mopper
Dunwoody, GA
jmmopper@aol.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Michael Davis
Leominster, MA
mdavis2@ft.newyorklife.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Doug Bissett
Wheeling, WV
doug@dougbissett.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Todd Hudson
GARNET VALLEY, PA
todd@hudsonplanninggroup.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Daniel Adams
Washington, DC
dadams@massmutualbrokerage.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

shane mayeux lafayette, LA shane.mayeux@prudential.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

William Lacy
Richmond, VA
jlacy@fsvllc.com

07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Brenda Coffman
Ottawa, KS
brenda@mcdanielknutson.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jeffrey Berg
Edina, MN
jberg@integrated-inc.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I have been in this business since October of 1965 and have helped many wonderful clients make prudent decision. In 1967 I did business with a college senior and just this past September 2014 he and his wife flew in from Portland Oregon for a retirement review. I am counseling with a 62 year old man who is dying of pancreatic cancer as we speak and his wife needs help making decisions financially. the bill as it stands now would not be helpful to them to get excellent, prudent counseling. Please rewrite this unworkable bill as it stands so we can go about helping people who need help. The life insurance industry provides 1.5 billion dollars in benefits a day to American families and all the money is accounted for in those companies. The US government pays out 1.9 billion dollars of Social Security Benefits per day to American families and all the money that was in the pot has been spent. This money has not been prudently watched over and the Congress has failed in their fiduciary capacity.

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.
- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.
- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.
- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Christopher Burgos hockessin, DE christopher.burgos@dsfg.com
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

MARTI STARK
Oxford, MS
marti@martistark.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Joseph Dunford
St Paul, MN
familydunford@gmail.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Thomson Chew
Rochester, NY
chew.thomson@gmail.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Corey Anderson
Saint Louis Park, MN
corey@securaconsultants.com

07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Christopher Byrnes
New Windsor, NY
cbyrnes@ft.newyorklife.com

07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

William Davis
Newport News, VA
wtdavis@cox.net
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Richard Damico
Staten Island, NY
damico@verizon.net
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Richard Damico
Staten Island, NY
damico@verizon.net
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jill Henning
burnsville, MN
jill@jillhenning.net
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Brian Dawson
Bear, DE
bdawson@bdfwealth.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Michael Andrews
Henrico, VA
mandrews@fsvllc.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Adele Taylor
Wilmington, DE
adele@gweiner.com
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Andrea Bearden
hokes bluff, AL
andrea.bearden@mwarep.org
07/09/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Joe Cirencione
Geneva, NY
jcirenci1@verizon.net
07/09/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Judy Beltz
Rochester, NY
judy.beltz@beltz-ianni.com
07/09/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

John Acker
Columbus, MS
john@johnacker.com
07/10/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

harrold cochran
lucedale, MS
harrold.o.cochran.jr@mwarep.org
07/10/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Gary Kelley
Martinsburg, WV
garykelley@allstate.com
07/10/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Martin Bailey
Lewiston, ME
martinbailey@allstate.com
07/10/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Dennis Fiore
Farmington Hills, MI
dfiore@financialguide.com
07/10/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Edward Paul Atkins
Little Rock, AR
jkepa@juno.com

07/10/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Joseph L. Dovi
Commack, NY
joseph.dovi@axa-advisors.com
07/10/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jon Foreman
Lincoln, NE
jonforeman@allstate.com

07/10/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kevin Rood
Maumee, OH
krrood@financialguide.com
07/10/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. Its important to my clients that I respond to protect their interests I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services. Just last week I spent much time with a client regarding her retirement accounts. She retired and was about to cash out her 401k as she was not sure how to get at her money for some needed cash flow issues. I was able to work with her to establish an IRA Rollover account and distribute to her just what she needed and invest the rest based upone her risk profile and investment preferences. This help allowed her to save significant tax dollars and preserved her future financial security.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Charles Frankian
Northborough, MA
cfrankian@msn.com
07/10/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Iris Nance
Virginia Beach, VA
inance@farmersagent.com
07/10/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Stuart Baber
Fayetteville, AR
sbaber51@gmail.com
07/10/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Robin Tomasula
east amherst, NY
rtomasula@yahoo.com
07/10/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Doug Johnson
Hammond, LA
djohnsonins@bellsouth.net

07/10/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

C. Victoria Smith
Louisville, KY
cvsmith01@wradvisors.com

07/10/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Joe Patterson
atlant, GA
joe.patterson@nm.com

07/10/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Yan Katz
Winchester, MA
yankatz@bulfinchgroup.com
07/10/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

B. Patrick Foust
Morgantown, WV
pfoust@luttner.com
07/10/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Gary Slavin
MASSAPEQUA, NY
slainsbiz@msn.com
07/10/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

ALLEN WAGNER
SOUTH POINT, OH
aw311@zoominternet.net
07/10/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Amy Edgren
St Louis Park, MN
amy@woodhillfinancial.com
07/10/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Tim Flitter
St James, MN
tim.flitter@thrivent.com
07/10/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Yesterday, July 9th, 2015 I visited with a young Hispanic couple. Allen and Elli. They have no risk insurance or investments. They live paycheck to paycheck yet want to be responsible to themselves and our community. They understand the need to save and invest for their future. Thus their reason to coming into my office. We visited for 1 1/2 hours. We ended up laying out a plan to build a savings account in a local bank. To get rid of expensive debts over then next 2 years. To then invest $100 a month into an IRA. They left my office so empowered that they could not stop from smiling. They have a plan. Then now have a future.

As owner of a financial office I will be paid a commission of $2 each month they put in that $100. I disclose my income to my clients. I am only paid when money goes in, I receive no other income from that investment. I do this every day. I have built up a nice business helping young, middle age, and old, with large and small investments. I then give guidance to them on an ongoing basis. If I don't, they may move their funds or end their contributions. I have ownership in their success! I need them to succeed.

The proposed rule changes I am reading will force me and my staff out of business or to only work with folks who already have money. We help NEW people who want to invest in person with a real person. Someone who has a name and office. Someone who will call back with an answer or guidance without sending a bill for the call. I don't want to have to do that. But without commission based income I will have to send out bills. New people who want to start a responsible life will be shut out. Allan and Elli would have had to pay me $250 for the information I shared for FREE yesterday. They don't have $250. But they will because of the advice I was able to give due to the time we shared together yesterday.

I need my clients to succeed in order for them to continue to invest with me and the company I represent. Under the new Fee Based plan I really won't have any skin in the game and as long as they pay me my $250-2,500 fee I really won't need to care if they make money or not. This proposal makes backward sense to me.

Brian Denney
Dahlonega, GA
brian.c.denney@mwarep.org
07/10/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

FAYE ZINN
CHARLESTON, WV
fzinnwv@aol.com
07/10/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

John Skoog
Eagan, MN
jskoog@financialguide.com

07/10/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

First of all, as a Retirement Plan Advisor, I receive no compensation, nor is it of any compensatory gain that I assist, or offer financial information to employees in companies whose plans I assist with investment information. By and large these folks spend their lives working, and do not generally understand the world of financial planning. When changes are made in their accounts, no commission is paid to the advisor! There is no gain for assistance other than to help the employee understand their alternatives, and the general movement of market trends. If anything, regulations that would keep advisors from making contact with employees who enjoy and desire our assistance would be extremely counterproductive in their retirement planning. For example, the general assistance that we provided our clients back during the stock market meltdown in 2008-2009 saved our clients thousands of dollars, and then turned around in Spring of 2009 to make them much more on their returns by being there with timely information.

No one provides that service like we can, no one. And we don't get paid one penny more to provide that service!

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft changes these standards completely, and shows a real misunderstanding of how the compensation is paid in qualified plans. Most advisors are paid on a small asset basis of plan equity, and not on a transaction basis. We do not advise employees to make changes for commission purposes, it doesn't matter! We only assist with information to enable them to make decisions that will put them in the best position financially, they depend on us, these regulations would severely limit our ability to help people, they would:

- Prohibit an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement, which puts the whole financial burden on the employer.

- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options, especially when we already have to prove that any changes are in the best interest of the client, and they already have to sign off on it.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans, this is un-wieldy and abhorrent.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.
- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.
- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.
- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Dennis Postema
Defiance, OH
postemainsurance@netscape.net
07/10/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Warren Ayala
Cheyenne, WY
wayala@mwfbi.com
07/10/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Matt Goodwin
Rome, GA
matthew.goodwin@nm.com
07/10/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. While I understand the intention to protecting individual investors this proposal would only drive advisors away from servicing their clients in the retirement space, which would leave more and more investors on their own. The preponderance of research shows that without the guidance of an advisor, individual investors underperform significantly because they make emotional decisions (fear and greed), they buy and sell at the wrong time, they do not rebalance, they chase past performance, they do not asset allocate appropriately, and they don't understand market risk. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

William Caplin
E. Longmeadow, MA
wacclu@verizon.net
07/10/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

John Rocco Saugus, MA
jsrocco@hotmail.com

07/10/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Mike Tingle
Pascagoula, MS
mike.tingle@sfbic.com
07/10/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jeffery Hodges
Vaiden, MS
jeffery.b.hodges@mwarep.org
07/10/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Vic Walsh
Moss Point, MS
vic@milletteadministrators.com
07/10/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Aubrey Pithwa
Virginia Beach, VA
aubrey.pithwa.dypx@statefarm.com
07/10/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

Recently, I helped Becky decide what to do with her old employer's 401K account when she terminated employment. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for her. I helped Becky decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet her risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of said IRA. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Becky would instead just cash out her 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if she didn't have access to me and my team.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.
- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.
- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.
- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

William Weimer
Mechanicsville, VA
wmweimer@ft.newyorklife.com
07/10/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

John Smith
Glen Allen, VA
jsmith1@farmersagent.com
07/10/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Joseph Beck
Lincoln, RI
josephbeck@bulfinchgroup.com
07/10/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Camille Bunicci
Islip Terrace, NY
camille.bunicci@farm-family.com
07/10/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Craig Bowden
Charleston, WV
cbowden@bbtscottstringfellow.com
07/10/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Craig Bowden
Charleston, WV
cbowden@bbtscottstringfellow.com
07/10/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Melissa McGrath
Wappingers Falls, NY
mkmcgrath2009@gmail.com
07/10/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Frank McCanham
Columbus, GA
fam@springmail.com
07/10/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

Recently, I worked with two (2) beneficiaries of their parent's IRA. They were not certain how to proceed on receiving the benefits. I advised them to take an income rather than a lump sum, and to seek out the advise of their tax advisor. Under the proposed rule, I could not do this. My services were provided and no fees or compenation whcih would be questionable under the law.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

River LaBelle
Hyannis, MA
rlabelle@ft.newyorklife.com
07/10/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Gregory Blaeser
Maplewood, MN
gblaeser@moneygeeks.com

07/10/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Mary Potter
Waterloo, IA
mhpotter@ft.newyorklife.com
07/10/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I am responding to this issue and have attached the text you have received from many other constituents.

I have been in the insurance and investment position for more than 30 years. Many times I have clients tell me how grateful they are that I could help them - honestly and fairly - make decisions that have now provided them with a comfortable retirement.

I believe that many reps are in the business and usually do not provide info that is beneficial to the client but which only pads their pockets. You need to separate out the good from the bad and not make it harder for the conscientious agent to work with those who need the service.

Companies such as New York Life monitor their agents very carefully and reprimand any agent found working in his own best interest. There are many companies who do no monitoring and have no interest in helping a client except when they can make a commission. This is the area you need to concentrate on, not just blanketing all the industry with guidelines.

I have belonged to NAIFA for my entire career and believe all agents should belong. This group also promotes the best of ethics and encourages only the best of those agents who belong.

Let's quit making rules that hurt the client as well as the career agent. Look for ways to recognize those who do good work and punish or get rid of the rest.

I work with accountants and lawyers who help clients manage their lives as well as possible. You must not destroy that partnership. Many of my clients are now older and have created retirement accounts which are helping them live the life they want.

This too makes life easier for each of them.

Making laws such as the ones you want to make only hurt the good agents. The bad ones will find a way around it.

I totally agree with the letter you have been receiving from others. I just wanted to add my personal feelings and thoughts to this. Please don't make the clients of reputable agents suffer. They need help and we can provide it if we do not have our hands tied.

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Zeb Taylor
Corinth, MS
zeb.taylor@mwarep.org
07/10/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Scott Spencer
Norwood, MA
scottspencer@bulfinchgroup.com
07/10/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Don Talerico
Dover, DE
dtalerico@yahoo.com
07/10/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Michael Callahan
No Mankato, MN
michael.callahan@minnesotafinancial.com
07/10/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Marcus Anderson
Waite Park, MN
marcus.anderson@thrivent.com
07/10/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jerry Brewer
Jackson, MS
jbrewer@alfains.com
07/10/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Daniel Thompson
Batesville, MS
daniel.thompson@sfbcc.com
07/10/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jana Cowgill
Clarkridge, AR
janacowgill@allstate.com
07/10/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Michael Walton
Mechanicsburg, PA
mpwalton@ft.newyorklife.com

07/10/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Victoria Plante
Minnetonka, MN
vicky@pfingroup.com
07/10/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

David Burg
Natick, MA
dburg@ft.newyorklife.com
07/10/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jerry Potter
South charleston, WV
potter549@msn.com
07/10/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Michael Oliverio
Morgantown, WV
michael.oliverio@nm.com

07/10/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Dorothy Greenhalgh
Centreville, VA
dminor_greenhalgh@yahoo.com
07/10/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ron Miles
Winchester, MA
ron.miles@hotmail.com
07/10/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Barry Page RFC
Ocean Springs, MS
pma101@yahoo.com
07/10/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

P.S. There are MANY more pressing issues at hand than complicating rules for the public, who DESPERATELY need financial advice today. More rules and regulations are not going to solve this issue, only complicate things further.

Natalie Hedrick
Silver spring, MD
nhedrick@metlife.com
07/10/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Desiree Anderson
Macon, GA
desiree.anderson@mwarep.org
07/10/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Thomas McKay
Rochester, NY
tmckay2@rochester.rr.com
07/10/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Patrick Newton
North Syracuse, NY
pnewton@highpointadv.com
07/10/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Joseph Eduardo
Rochester, NY
joe@jeduardo.net

07/10/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

John Dewey
Edina, MN
jdewey@sagepointadvisor.com

07/10/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Donald Gray
Water Valley, MS
don.gray@sfbcc.com
07/10/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Sim Boyle
Green Bay, WI
boylesim@yahoo.com
07/10/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Gene Storms
Eden Prairie, MN
gene.storms@nm.com
07/10/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Laurie Sall
Troy, MI
laurie@lauriesall.com
07/10/2015

Re: Conflict of Interest Rule--Retirement Investment Advice [4/20/2015]

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

I helped a client of mine purchase a contract in 2006. She was diagnosed with Alzheimer's disease several years ago. Her daughter is no longer able to care for her at home and has been able to provide her with excellent care through distributions from her account.

Eric Prior Defiance, OH
eric.prior3@gmail.com
07/10/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jeremy Oliver
Rosemount, MN
joandcathy@gmail.com
07/10/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Elvis Gates
Long Beach, MS
elvisgates@gmail.com
07/10/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Mark Boyle
Milwaukee, WI
mark.boyle@nm.com
07/10/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Dennis Dean
Lindenhurst, IL
dennismdeanlutcf@yahoo.com
07/11/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Clinton Hoy
Belle, WV
ctins@suddenlink.net

07/11/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Michael Kane
framingham, MA mg.kane@verizon.net
07/11/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Laura DeGolier
Fond du Lac, WI
degolierinsurance@tds.net
07/11/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

Does not solve any problems because the process already has oversight and standards that each agent is required to follow. After a sale is completed it is further reviewed by a compliance officer. Each client now signs paperwork that requires them to disclose their personal information so that appropriate choices can be provided to clients.

It is the government's wish that people have choices; therefore they may make decisions that are not appropriate for them. Greed often enters into their calculation and choices are made based on the highest rate of return.

Prospectuses and multiple pages of explanations are provided to clients now. Asking them to read even more paperwork will not solve the problem because they will not.

- In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jeffrey Carey
Swansea, MA
jeffreycarey@financialguide.com
07/11/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I am writing you out of deep concern. The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The current proposal will confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the overall ability of advisors to properly serve retirement investors.

My opposition to many of the provisions in the complex regulation does not in any way, mean that I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. Quite frankly that has always been my philosophy. My clients, most of whom I have served for many years, helping them achieve better financial futures, know very well that I have their best interests in mind. The reality is, that given today's highly competitive environment & access to information, if I did not put their needs first, they would in fact no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers, the same folks who are often most in need of prudent & timely financial advice. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL must resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written, the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

As many of the statistics regarding our county's saving & investing habits tell us, savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers

and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing, if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

I urge you to please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees. Given the evaporation of traditional pensions in the workforce, and the many challenges facing our Social Security system, it is absolutely paramount we properly address these vital issues.

Drew DeWitt
Excelsior, MN
drew_dewitt@hotmail.com
07/11/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Marvin Reynolds
Kaysville, UT
marv@beradvisors.com
07/11/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services. My experience (31 years) has taught me that the middle and lower end markets are underserved as it is. Fees and more expensive than commissions especially over any period longer than 6 or 7 years and most people will be more neglected if they have to pay for advice. If anything we need more public education not more advisor restrictions. I give my clients and prospects great advice and multiple options, they choose what works best for them. Please do not impose this fiduciary regulation.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Thomas Sullivan
Needham, MA
tsullivan@htk.com

07/12/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Levi Schapiro
Brooklyn, NY
lyschapiro@ft.newyorklife.com
07/12/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jatinder Singh
LAKE SUCCESS, NY
jsingh07@ft.newyorklife.com
07/12/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Miguel Taveras
Houston, TX
miguel.taveras@wslife.com
07/13/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Alvin Parra
Los Angeles, CA
alvin@strategicchoices.com
07/13/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

In my practice I offer fixed and indexed annuities, and once held a Series 6 and 63 license. I now only offer fixed products due to the complexity and excessive fees within variable products. Although I personally agree with the intent of the DOL, savers of all economic status will be affected.

To place the burden and legal responsibility to the agent or advisor in the field, for products and third party compensation rules is unfair and unworkable. I know firsthand that most clients, especially low-income clients will not pay a fee to get financial advice. The unintended consequence will be dire and will only support the institutional financial entities that have traditionally focused only on high net worth clients.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Pete Gross
Cincinnati, OH
pete@petegross.net
07/13/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Cristina Battle
Houston, TX
cbattle@farmersagent.com
07/13/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Linda Myers
Memphis, TN
leighmyers@comcast.net
07/13/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Nathan Way
Amherst, NY
nway@metlife.com
07/13/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

The people you're trying to protect would be the one's hurt most by this proposed rule. You need to look for ways to weed out the financial services companies and/or advisors who are in this business for the wrong reasons. The career advisors already act in a manner to morally meet their clients objectives and goals. Adding this extra layer of regulation will leave many of the middle market with out an avenue for advice and service in the most complex and meaningful area of their life, money and investing.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Matthew Echelmeier
Lansdale, PA
echins1@aol.com

07/13/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

John Russell
Oxford, MS
johnrussell_99@yahoo.com
07/13/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

jimmy taylor
biloxi, MS
jimmy.taylor.b9uu@statefarm.com
07/13/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Joseph Puerzer
Pittsburg, CA
joseph.e.puerzer@mwarep.org
07/13/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Peter Knutson
Prairie Village, KS
peterknutson2824@gmail.com
07/13/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Celestine Brungardt
Salina, KS
celestine.brungardt@mwarep.org
07/13/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

DuWayne Mews
Stratford, WI
duwayne@finstratwi.com
07/13/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Dominick Vassos
Addison, IL
dwvassos@ft.newyorklife.com
07/13/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Arthur Gruber
Nanuet, NY
arthurgruber@netzero.net
07/13/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Steven McCartin
silver spring, md, MD
steve@mccartin.com
07/13/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Sarah Mosley
Westbrook, ME
sarah@mosleyfinancialgroup.com
07/13/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jeff Marsh
Torrington, WY
jeff@bolistrategicpartners.com
07/13/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

W. Joel Bell, CFP
Oxford, MS
jbell@financialguide.com
07/13/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez and Senator Cochran and Senator Wicker:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jerry Corless
Memphis, TN
jcorless@financialguide.com
07/13/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

SCOTT FOSTER
CONYERS, GA
st8farmguru@gmail.com
07/13/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Brad Schaefer
Williamsburg, IA
schaefer.brad@princor.com
07/13/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Richard Dent
bixby, OK
rjdent@ft.newyorklife.com
07/13/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Daryl Ellis
Baton Rouge, LA
drellis@ft.newyorklife.com
07/13/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Mark Robbins
Colleyville, TX
mark_robbins@benefitarchitects.com
07/13/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Barry Cook
Phoenix, AZ
bacook@ft.newyorklife.com
07/13/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Adam Bar
Los Angeles, CA
bar.adam@yahoo.com
07/13/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Brenda Brink
Selah, WA
bbrink@ft.newyorklife.com
07/13/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Ana t Busse arvesu
Miami, FL
aarvesu@ft.newyorklife.com
07/13/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Charles Richey
Kennewick, WA, WA
charbetrichey@charter.net
07/13/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jeanne Kelly
Yakima, WA
bbrink4@ft.newyorklife.com
07/13/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Terence McTigue
Eden Prairie, MN
terry.mctigue@nm.com
07/13/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Eric Anderson
Salem, OR
esanderson@ft.newyorklife.com
07/13/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Eduardo Garcia
Corpus Christi, TX
garciae@ft.newyorklife.com

07/13/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Mitch Carmody
Syracuse, NY
mccarmody@mabinc.net
07/13/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kyle Cordts
Wichita, KS
kyle.e.cordts@mwarep.org
07/13/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Yuka Nakahara-Goven
Carrollton, TX
ynakahara@ft.newyorklife.com
07/13/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Larry L. Taylor
Abilene, TX
lltaylor@ft.newyorklife.com
07/13/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Allison Crews
canton, MS
allison@gcrews.com
07/13/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Mark Francis
Syracuse, NY
francisma@ft.newyorklife.com
07/13/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Christopher Carter
Miramar, FL
ccarter1@hotmail.com
07/13/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Ben Gamble
Huntsville, AL
bbgfinancial@gmail.com

07/13/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Shane Bauman
Castle Rock, CO
shane.bauman@mwarep.org
07/13/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Recently, I helped Dustin decide what to do with his 401(k) account when he terminated employment. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for Dustin. I helped Dustin decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet his risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, and liquidity needs. I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Dustin would instead just cash out his 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if he hadn't had access to my services. Additionally, I have helped Dustin at no charge to him with his new 401 (K) to select options that fit his needs and goals.

Paul Peele
Norfolk, VA
ptpeelee@cox.net
07/13/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Sara Decatoire
Springfield, IL
sara@naifa-il.com

07/13/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Scott Knowlton
memphis, TN
sknowlt@yahoo.com
07/13/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Dennis Smith
trophy club, TX
dennismith129@gmail.com
07/13/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Mike Vinson
cordova, TN
mvinson@financialguide.com
07/13/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Alvaro Ramos
Corpus Christi, TX
alvaro25@gmail.com
07/13/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Frank King
North Las Vegas, NV
flking@ft.newyorklife.com
07/13/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Harry Broussides
Walpole, MA
harry_broussides@bulfinchgroup.com
07/13/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Michael J. Hayes Jr., CPA, CFP, RICP
Fredericksburg, VA
michael.hayes@axa-advisors.com

07/13/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Peter Jilkov
new orleans, LA
pvjilkov@ft.nyl.com
07/13/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Seth Krasne
Tucson, AZ
skrasne@ft.newyorklife.com
07/13/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Scott Fowler
Issaquah, WA
scott.fowler@comcast.net
07/13/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

George Swain
Williamson, WV
george.w.swain.r75x@statefarm.com
07/13/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Mark Cain
billings, MT
markcain@cornerstonefa.com
07/13/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

I have been working with clients for 28 years and they need all the education and support available. They need someone like myself to help them understand all the different choices. Then I let the client chose the tools they like and that best fits their goals and risk tolerance. Those of us in this industry need commissions to run our business, pay staff, and to be in business to properly service the clients into the future.

Monica Clark
Alamo, TX
mlclark01@ft.newyorklife.com
07/13/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Alan Carl
El Paso, TX
acarl@fnbagency.com
07/13/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Grant Foster CLU
Austin, TX
gfoster@fosterfinancial.com
07/13/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Adrian Guess
Memphis, TN
aguess@financialguide.com
07/13/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Philip Engelmann
Miami, FL
melphil2000@yahoo.com
07/13/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Mauricio Giraldo
Weston, FL
mauricio@thehorizonsfinancial.com
07/13/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Donald Damon
Middleton, WI
damon@chorus.net
07/13/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jason Kehler
Atlanta, GA
kebler.jason@principal.com
07/13/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Recently, I helped Neal decide what to do with his 401(k) account when he terminated employment with one company and joined another. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for Neal. I helped Neal decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet Neal's financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds and an annuity. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Neal would instead just cash out his 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if he hadn't had access to my services.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Keith Rainey
Hattiesburg, MS
krainey@ft.newyorklife.com
07/13/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

James Van Ham
Naperville, IL
jimmyv@stgfin.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Christopher Secreto
Morgantown, WV
csecreto@luttner.com
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Michael Gaeta
Muscatine, IA
michaelgaeta@hotmail.com

07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ralph Varland
Wheaton, IL
rvarland@voyafa.com
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Timothy Rueter
Wheaton, IL
tim.rueter@foundationws.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Erica Takach
Chicago, IL
takach23@yahoo.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Julie Miller
Chatham, IL
julie.halemiller@countryfinancial.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

All generations need retirement and investment advice. The baby boomers are marching into retirement and have no idea what to do with their 401k's. They don't know how to invest in order to properly diversify. At the other end of the spectrum are the millenials who realize they need to save more than their parents have but don't know how to. They need different advice but just as much in order to plan for a successful retirement. Please allow me to continue doing my job by helping all of these folks.

Krista Johnson
Lac du Flambeau, WI
krista.johnson@thrivent.com
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I regularly help clients who are about to retire plan for their retirement income. This is a complex situation for them. These nearly retired people usually don't have the expertise to choose the best solution for themselves. I am able to help by educating them on what is available and narrowing down the overwhelming amount of choices to those that are suitable. Without access to this kind of help many people would run out of money before they die leaving them in a gloomy retirement rather than a pleasant one. We all dream of retirement as a time to relax and have fun and to experience those things we couldn't do while working. If it isn't planned for properly, this dream will likely never become a reality.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Peter Wilmot
Elmhurst, IL
pwilmot@sbcglobal.net
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Recently, I helped a client decide what to do with her 401(k) account when she terminated employment. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for her. I helped her decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet her risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds and an annuity. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that my client would instead just cash out her 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if she hadn't had access to my services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.
- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.
- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.
- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Eileen Holzman
Andover, MA
eholzman@centinelfg.com
07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Kimberly Henson
Edinburg, TX
khenson_89@yahoo.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jason Christopher
Poughkeepsie, NY
jasonchristopher@financialguide.com
07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jerry Jackson
Peoria, IL
jacksonfinancial@yahoo.com
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Daryl Ellis
Baton Rouge, LA
drellis@ft.newyorklife.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

J. Garcia
Shreveport, LA
jgarcia@moremanmoore.com

07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Scott Uram
Blaine, MN
suram@farmersagent.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Matthew Cuplin
Madison, WI
matt@midwestfinancialgroup.net
07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Christine Noel
Tampa, FL
cnoel927@aol.com
07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Bradley Brown
West Des Moines, IA
brown.brad@principal.com
07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Javier Lugo
White Plains, NY
javier.lugo@prudential.com
07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Timothy Weimer
Wheaton, IL
tnweimer@weimerassociates.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

The rule as written is restrictive and hurts the smaller investors and financial professionals. This needs to be fair to all and not favor only those who do business on a fee basis. This is just another way to add more testing fees and registration fees to this already over regulated industry.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data

retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Robert Sweiss
Chicago, IL
robert.sweiss@countryfinancial.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Dhilayla Pompa
McAllen, TX
dpompa@ft.newyorklife.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

D English
ALUM CREEK,, WV
dgenlish@ft.newyorklife.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Thomas Jones
Bountiful, UT
tjones1@farmersagent.com
07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ben Buenzow
Urbandale, IA
ben@benbuenzow.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Monica Clark
Alamo, TX
mlclark01@ft.newyorklife.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

John Mackarey
Scranton, PA
jmackarey@ft.newyorklife.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Sherrill Phelps
Alexandria, LA
sephelps@bellsouth.net
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Lanny Kuehl
Garnavillo, IA
kuehls@alpinecom.net
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jorge McKenzie
Laredo, TX
jumckenzie@ft.newyorklife.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jeffrey Adler
Glencoe, IL
jeffrey@ecrllc.com
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Roger Lewis
Bolingbrook, IL
lewis.roger@principal.com
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Joseph Fenlon
Milwaukee, WI
fenlon.joe@principal.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Lilia Arandela
Corpus Christi, TX
larandela@ft.newyorklife.com
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Recently, I talked to a newly widowed and disabled Nurse who has 3 qualified plans from 3 work places. She does not know what to do. I introduced to her the concept of consolidation so the 3 plans will be placed in one account. After asking her what she wants to do with money, her risk tolerance, whether she wants to access to her money while it is growing, she liked the idea and thankful for the advice. The Adviser will re-visit and re-brief her again as soon as all statements of accounts are ready as reference for implementation of the Client desires and goals.

Paul Adams
Mill creek, WA
paul_adams@sfgwa.com
07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Eduardo Rivera
Alton, TX
eorivera@ft.newyorklife.com
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Carlos Antunez
Edinburg, TX
cantunez@ft.newyorklife.com
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Douglas Vanker
Weslaco, TX
dvanker@ft.newyorklife.com

07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Timmy Thomas
Metairie, LA
timmythomas@yahoo.com
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Walter Scott
Oshkosh, WI
walter@independemcedinancialllc.com
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many of my retirement saver clients without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Brent Prather
Chicago, IL
bprather@financialguide.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Penny Maly
Brenham, TX
penny.maly@thrivent.com
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

CARL WEIMER
Havre de Grace, MD
carlweimer@hotmail.com

07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Scott Garrett
Woodhull, IL
sgarrett@ft.nyl.com
07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Cesalee Mullen
Drummonds, TN
cesaleemullen@gmail.com

07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Rick L Frank
Paullina, IA
frankfinancialgroup@yahoo.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

I have been in the financial services industry for twenty one years and have helped many of my clients save for retirement. Without my help many would have thrown up their hands and not done anything. As some of them are now retiring and depending on me to guide them through the distribution of their assets to fund their retirement. I am working on a case today that would have cost the client over 20% of their retirement funds if they did what they first thought. With my help we were able to accomplish what they wanted and saved the 20% cost they would have had. I am not able to charge a fee so with these changes I would be out of business if I can not get paid by commissions.

Tim Leonchik
Chicago, IL
leonchik.tim@principal.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Tyler Kamerman
West Des Moines, IA
kamerman.tyler@principal.com
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Dan Buck
Caldwell, ID dbuck@shafferbuckinsurance.com
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Creed Archibald
Alpine, UT
creedarchibald@yahoo.com
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Luis Gutierrez
Brownsville, TX
lgutierrez@ft.newyorklife.com
07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ross Schmelzer
Sturgeon Bay, WI
ross@rwmwis.com
07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jani Picard
Oshkosh, WI
jan@foxvalleywealth.com
07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Katie Young
Springfield, IL
katie.young.kyke@statefarm.com

07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Recently, I have helped several customers decide what to do with their 401(k) accounts when they terminated employment. Each client is handled case by case, but let me tell you about Bill specifically. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for Bill. I helped him decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet his risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds and an annuity. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Bill would instead just cash out his 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if he hadn't had access to my services

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

John R. Ahrens CLTC
East Amherst, NY
jahrens@financialguide.com
07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Daniel Reagan
S. Burlington, VT
dan@castleadvisors.com
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Craig Schillig
Bettendorf, IA
cschillig@financialguide.com
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Paul Miller Miller, CLU, CBC
Elburn, IL
pmiller@sullivan-agency.com
07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

McKenzie Coleman
Metairie, LA
mckenzie.coleman@nm.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jacob Mokry
San Antonio, TX
jacob@jacobmokry.com
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Warren West Cleveland, MN
buster@hickorytech.net
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

People need to know how their retirement assets coordinate with their other assets and sources of income. Don't take away my ability to help them.

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Sean Calip
Chicago, IL
scalip@ft.newyorklife.com

07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Bonne Hodges
McAllen, TX
bchodges@ft.newyorklife.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

David Giddings
Germantown, WI
dgiddings@rcinsure.com
07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Melissa Labus
Chicago, IL
labus.melissa@principal.com
07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

ANTHONY MASTRONICOLA
Irvington, NY
anthony.mastronicola@prudential.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jim Keung
Salem, WI
jim.keung@countryfinancial.com
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Lee Harris
St. Louis, MO
lharris.metrogroup@gmail.com
07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Justin Chibucos
Glen Ellyn, IL
justin.chibucos@axa-advisors.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Mary Schaal
Millington, TN
mardanschaal@yahoo.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Carlos Tamez
Weslaco, TX
ctamez@ft.newyorklife.com
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Recently, I helped Jaime decide what to do with his 401(k) account when he terminated employment. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for Jaime. I helped Jaime decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet Jaime's risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds and an annuity. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Jaime would instead just cash out his 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if he hadn't had access to my services.

Cody VerHuel
Des Moines, IA
verhuel.cody@principal.com
07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

myoung ko
new york, NY
mjko@ft.nyl.com

07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Bradley Struve
Woodbury, MN
brad@pilotfinancialmn.com
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Timothy Hebert
morgan city, LA
thebert@newyorklife.com

07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Vincent Welsh
Marion, IA
vince.welsh@gmail.com
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Bobal Fletcher
Baldwin, NY
bfletcher@ft.newyorklife.com
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Binh Nguyen
North Barrington, IL
binhxuan@yahoo.com
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Albert S. Kirchner CLU
Shaker Heights, OH
albert@entrustfinancial-inc.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. Currently, I am virtually a volunteer as I help the underserved make good financial decisions that will enable them to grow their retirement account at low levels of risk. My compensation is modest at best as I may have to spend considerable time discerning the dozens of alternatives available to a taxpayer planning for retirement.

With the proposed regulations & guidelines, I would have to leave this area of counsel that I have been serving since 1975. Please use better judgement than what the DOL is proposing.

Timothy Jackson
Bountiful, UT
timothy.james.jackson@gmail.com
07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Steven Ibarra
Orem, UT
sh.ibarra@gmail.com
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

