The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Dan Ledbetter CLU CHFC
Greensboro, NC
dan.ledbetter@nm.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Shannon McGill
Denver, CO
shannon9579@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Randy Carlson
North Platte, NE
randy@carlsonfinancialgroupinc.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Department of Labor and Congressman,

I have been in the insurance and investment business for over 35 years, both as a sales manager and as an agent. One of the areas I work in is retirement planning. Most of my clients are typical, average investors, and not large companies or corporations.

I have built my business based on relationships and trust with those I represent. Many of the people I work with are not being served by some in our industry because they don't have large enough portfolios. None the less, they need the advice and assistance as any investor would.

The proposed Fiduciary Rule for retirement investment advice as I read it appears to be unworkable in its current version. It looks to be full of red tape, increased costs, and confusing regulation. What is intended to help the consumer ends up hurting them in my opinion.

I believe that the current draft of the Fiduciary Rule will have unintended consequences, especially for the small investor and the representative that serve them. The Department of Labor is trying to fix a problem that does not exist.

My clients know that I have their best interests in mind. If I didn't, they would find a new advisor. If you take care of your customers in the right way, they will take care of you.

I ask that you consider re-writing this rule after careful consideration of all of the ideas and suggestions I know that the department has received from various groups and sources around the country.

Thank you.

Devon Pilney
Lake Oswego, OR
devon.pilney@northstarfinancial.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Grayson Fanelli
Carolina Beach, NC
grayson.fanelli@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

To Whom it May Concern,

Recently, I helped a client of mine, Theresa, decide what to do with her 401(k) account when she terminated employment. I was the one that did the planning with the employer, which allowed us to set up and implement the 401-k from the beginning. After the 401-k was in place, I personally met with each and every employee to help them evaluate and assess their goals, to help them align their 401k to those goals. Since I had built the personal relationship with Theresa, I was the first person she called when she left her employer. She came to me because she trusts our advice and planning.

The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for Theresa. I helped Theresa decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet her and her husband's financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds and an annuity.

Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. If I wouldn't get paid for the services I provide, I wouldn't keep providing those services. In that case, the likely result would have been that Theresa would instead just cash out her 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty. A wrong decision but one likely if she hadn't had access to my services.

If

Francine Maness
San Antonio,, TX
francine1776@att.net
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Terry Curnes
Omaha, NE
terry.curnes@curnesgroup.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

My last issue is that the DOL should not be regulating in an area they have very little experience in. The financial industry has two very good regulatory bodies in FINRA and the SEC. These two entities have the knowledge base to understand the complex connections amongst the various service providers within our industry. My fear is that given the size of the DOL proposal and the complexity of our industry, unintended consequences could do substantial damage.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Bob Schroth Hermiston, OR
bschroth@simmons-financial.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Roger Thompson
Mansfield, AR
roger.thompson@afbic.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to

discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Adele Taylor
Wilmington, DE
adele@gweiner.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to

discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Matt Basile
Dover, DE
matt@basileagency.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to

discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Shanna Strickland
Rocky Mount, NC
shanna.strickland@axa-advisors.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Kevin Conners
Wilmington, DE
kevin@ktbenefits.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to

discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

James Ellowitch Roseland, NJ
jim.ellowitch@lfg.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Bryan Jackson
Jeffersonville, IN
bryan.jackson.pobs@statefarm.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Don Weitzel
Kingston, GA
weitzeld@bellsouth.net
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Brian J Schroeder LUTCF
Brentwood, CA
brian@advocareassoc.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Sharon Sabo
Buckhannon, WV
sharon.sabo.bwcp@statefarm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

E. Brian Smith, Jr., CFP®

Jacksonville, FL

b.smith@jwccemail.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Dustin Aleman
Greenwood Village, CO
daleman@farmersagent.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

Recently, I helped a client decide what to do with her 401(k) account when she terminated employment. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for Sarah. I helped Sarah decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet her risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of the mutual funds. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Sarah would instead just cash out her 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if she hadn't had access to my services.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Gary Sipos
San Francisco, CA
gary@siposfinancial.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Courtney L. Livingston FIC, LUTCF
Watertown, SD
courtney.livingston@thrivent.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

As we work with client's to look at what is best for them when they desire to make a move with there investments why can't they be entitled to proper advice from a trained and continually educated financial person? Without this proper information the client could make a decision that financially would not be in their best interest. With the rule as being proposed the client could be the biggest loser.

John E. deMontel Financial Advisor
Corpus Christi, TX
johnd@arvakfinancialservices.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

As a full service financial advisor, I provide education and professional advice to employers, employees, families, and businesses. I recently helped Ronny decide what to do with his 401k when he left his employer. He very much appreciated my time and thorough assistance and guidance through the maze of regulations and options. Yes, I made a commission which was disclosed and he was quite happy with his choices. Under the current rule, I would have been unable to provide him with valuable and life changing assistance.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.
- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.
- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.
- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

David Henderson
Aurora, CO
dhenderson914@msn.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for 20+ years, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Eric Hines
Fairview, NC
eric.hines.i2o8@statefarm.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Marjorie W. Farquhar CLU
Richmond, VA
mfarquhar@cambridgesecure.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jarod Pedersen
Nevada, IA
jpedersen@tfamail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Gary Hershgordon
Jenkintown, PA
gmh98@aol.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Recently attended a retirement luncheon for a Col in the Army and during her thank you speech she mentioned how she never makes a financial decision without me. Sometime we do not even realize the positive major impact on our long time clients daily lives.

Thank You

Larry G. Johnson, CSA, LUTCF
Plymouth, MI
larry.johnson@fbinsmi.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Larry Poole
Bossier City, LA
larrypoole@hotmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Patrick Robison
Louisville, KY
patrick.robison@nm.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Daryl Ellis
Baton Rouge, LA
drellis@ft.newyorklife.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Cameron Rindal
Missoula, MT
cjrindal@ft.nyl.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Craig Swerczek
Ashland, NE
craig.swerczek@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I have recently become aware of a new rule being proposed by the DOL. I am not a financial advisor, I am a client of a financial advisor that also directs my employer's 401k plan. It is my understanding that since this individual directs my company's 401k plan, he will no longer be able to provide me with investment guidance for my personal savings outside of my 401k plan and still earn a reasonable fee for his services. I have come to respect this advisor as he has my best interests at heart and has provided me with the advice and knowledge to grow my personal savings to levels I would not have been able to reach without his expert guidance.

I do not see how this new rule will help those of us seeking the needed guidance in order for us to maximize our investment returns in hopes of someday being able to retire comfortably without having to rely on government assistance programs and be a drain on society. Please take the time to rethink this proposed rule and make the necessary changes so I can have a "one stop shop" for my investment advisor if I so choose.

Paulette Auclair
Milwaukee, WI
paulette@auclair.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Robert Smith
mokena, IL
robert.w.smith@countryfinancial.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

James King
Overland Park, KS
jim.king@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Kelby Meyers
Lincoln, NE
kelbymeyers@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Yaddie Doan
Amarillo, TX
yadiradoan@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Michael Nau
Eugene, OR
michaelnau@allstate.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Sarah Skofield
Livingston, MT
sarah@sarahskofield.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Deanna Burrough
Jacksonville, FL
deanna.burrough@prudential.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Richard Hiler
Hummelstown, PA
rbhiler@aol.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

A. Duer Pierce
Centreville, DE
bud@financialhouse.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Mike Konjoyan
Los Osos, CA
mike@mikekonjoyan.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

thomas cornfield
Ann Arbor, MI
tcornfield@metlife.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Keith Hennessey, CLU, LUTCF
West Des Moines, IA
keith.hennessey@fbfs.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

TRAVIS BARTLETT
Clinton, MO
p123024@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Daniel Donohue
Novi, MI
ddonohue@financialguide.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Michelle R Drum
sedalia, MO
mdrum@shelterinsurance.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Eric Shepard
Rochester, MN
eshepard@metlife.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Richard Koch
Lake Elmo, MN
koch.dick@principal.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for more than forty years, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Donald Olsen
Hanover, IL
dolsen@finsncialguide.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Vince Lockhart
suffolk, VA
vince.lcokhart.bfb6@statefarm.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ian Spetner
Santa Barbara, CA
stlcardinals255@aol.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jeffrey Ruffatto
Columbus, MT
jeff.ruffatto@kofc.org
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Shawn Wermerskirchen
st louis park, MN
swermerskirc@metlife.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Angela Thomas
Jacksonville, FL
amthomas2009@hotmail.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Aaron Young
Louisville, KY
aaron.young502@gmail.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Eric McGinley
McLean, VA
eric.mcginley@ffgdc.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Bill Oglesby
asheville, NC
oklife12@att.net

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Rich Campbell
Marion, IL
richard.campbell@countryfinancial.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Todd Chambers
Knoxville, IA
tchambers@mckayinsagency.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Bobby Stewart
Sanford, NC
joeystewart7@aol.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Larry C. Clayton
Germantown, TN
larry@anchorpointadvisors.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Thomas Perez, Senator Alexander, Senator Corker, Representative Fincher

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Drew Federau CARMEL, IN
drew@drewfed.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

John Tuttle
East Syracuse, NY
john.tuttle@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. As a CLU, I have pledged to act in my clients best interest, using the biblical Golden Rule as a guide... do unto others as you would have them do for you. The guide tells us to act as we would do for ourselves with the same set of facts. Years ago I learned that doing the right thing for my clients is the only way to have a long term relationship. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. In my 35 years of dealing with clients, I have learned that disclosure is meaningless if it isn't read. My interactions with clients over these years, tells me that if the disclosure is longer than one page, it is highly unlikely they will read it. If that is the case, it is incumbent on the regulators to find a more concise and simple way to inform our prospects. I have found that clients do business with me because they trust me. I need to continue to be trustworthy. No regulation or law is needed for me to act in the best interest of my clients because it is in my best interest as well.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied. The BIC exemption does not allow me to receive more compensation for advising a plan participant rolling over to an IRA than I received while the participant was a plan participant even when the services I provide are different. It makes no sense to me to have a regulation that restricts the services I may provide due to changing circumstances of the participant and not be allowed to charge for those services.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

ANTHONY BUECHLER
PAPILLION, NE
tonybis@cox.net

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Steve Braun
Highland Park, IL
steve.braun@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Shelley Stempek
Columbus, NE
shelley@shelleystempek.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez;

One of the things I find that is most confusing for my clients is all the options in investing. They are most often frustrated because their employer has handed them paperwork and told them to complete it and return without any type of education. Why wouldn't you want a financial representative to be able to help in these situations.

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers

and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Greg Boyer
West Lafayette, IN
greg_boyer@comcast.net
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

I am currently helping Mike and Teresa decide what to do with their 401(k) accounts and current IRA's since they are both retiring. I was able to show them that they could afford to retire and have helped them see how. I advised them to keep some money in their 401k because of the fixed 4% return that they can get. They were not aware of that. I also showed them how they could save expense fees on his former 401k by rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA). they agreed that was the best choice. I am helping them decide how to invest the 401k and IRA accounts to best meet their risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and income needs. I will receive commissions from the purchase of mutual funds and an annuity. Under the current proposed rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that they would instead just cash out their 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if they hadn't had access to my services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Bonnie Mitchell
Little Silver, NJ
bm165rt35@aol.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

William Feiler
River Falls, WI
feiler@wildblue.net
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Larry Anderson
Glencoe, MN
larry.anderson.j0mq@statefarm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

David Tuzson
Scottsbluff, NE
dtuzson@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Brian Holevinski
Little Silver, NJ
bholevinski@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jordan Delp
Davenport, IA
jordan.delp@ozark-national.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

Recently, I helped Ethan and his wife Sarah decide what would be best for them to do with her 401(k) from a former employer. The decision was made that rolling it into an IRA with the idea of converting it to a ROTH IRA was the best course of action for them as a family. I helped Ethan and Sarah to invest the IRA account to best meet their risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Sarah would instead just cash out her 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if she hadn't had access to my services.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Lisa Cano
Greenville, OH
lisa@troyohioinsurance.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Aaron Giroux
Corona del Mar, CA
agiroux@ims4u.net
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Ken Summerfield
Papillion, NE
ksummerf@amfam.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

DeWitt Buchanan
Channahon, IL
dewitt@safeharbor.solutions

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

It is my sincere hope that the proposed changes regarding fiduciaries can be revised so that they are able to be implemented in a practical manner. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

I work with many small business owners and their employees. The common desire they all share is to do their best in preparing for retirement. This legislation would increase plan costs and not only make it more difficult for those I serve to meet their goals, but it also complicates my efforts to serve them.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Anna Finnesgard
Chaska, MN
afinnesgard@metlife.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

David Barrist
Lafayette Hill, PA
david_barrist@barrist.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Arthur Vander Wilt
Sheldon, IA
vanderwilt.art@princor.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Gina Mills
Robinson, IL
gina.mills@countryfinancial.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Clint Durocher
reno, NV
cdurocher@farmersagent.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Kelly Huggins
Austin, TX
kelly.huggins@northstarfinancial.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Matt Donnelly
Minneapolis, MN
donnelly.matt@princor.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Matthew Wegehaupt
Omaha, NE
matthew.wegehaupt@yahoo.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Katherine Wichmann Zacharias
Encinitas, CA
thewic@sbcglobal.net

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

william ayers
beaumont, TX
wayers@ayerspatton.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Gayle Prescott
Louisville, KY
gprescott@aol.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Terry Headley
LaVista, NE
theadley@headleyfinancial.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Pam Parker
Brenham, TX
pam@vandykerankin.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Akil Davis
Omaha, NE
akil.davis@curnesgroup.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Michelle (Shelly) Gams
Billings, MT
mgams@retire-solutions.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Laurence Petty
Helena, MT
lpetty@ft.newyorklife.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Ranette Rindal
Lolo, MT
rrindal@hotmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Brian Reese
Placentia, CA
breeselife@aol.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

James Handley
Indianapolis, IN
jphandley@handleybenefits.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Bryan Holen
kearney, NE
bholen@usa.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Cindy Kessler
Denver, CO
lhg@att.net

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

John J. Thompson
Weymouth, MA
jjtins@comcast.net

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Joshua Murdoch
Holdrege, NE
murdoch.joshua@princor.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Heather Ardoin
Shreveport, LA
hmcagle@ft.newyorklife.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jay Moyer
Houston, TX
jay.moyer.t5t9@statefarm.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Guy Richardson
Valley Glen, CA
guyrichardson@earthlink.net
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Penny Hardrick
Palisade, CO
pjhardrick@ft.newyorklife.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Anthony Briselli
Lewisburg, PA
abriselli@aol.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Phillip Vance
Roswell, GA
philvance@charter.net
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Tony White
jacksonville, FL
tony.white@prudential.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Gary Pierce
Kent, OH
fgpierce@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Glendae Tuthill
Fayetteville, GA
gtuthill@benevestco.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Lewis Doane, CLU

Omaha, NE

lidoane@cox.net

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Ron Hayes
Lewistown, MT
rrhayes@ft.newyorklife.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. Over the years, I have been able to demonstrate to my clients that I have their best interests in mind, otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers, most of whom are lower and middle class working families. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, in this case, investment education is narrowly defined, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

For instance, recently, I helped Karen, a typical decide what to do with her 401(k) account after she had terminated employment. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for Karen. I helped her decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet her risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, and liquidity needs. I received commissions from the purchase of an annuity. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Karen would instead have just cash out her 401(k) and would have suffered the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely enacted if she hadn't had access to my services.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Deyman Doolittle bargersville, IN
deyman.doolittle@mwarep.org
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

DAVID SPELLMAN CUMBERLAND, ME
dspel2buy@aol.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

While I am sure these changes are being made with the best of intentions, the actual result will be lack of access to a licensed advisors -- and in many cases, consumers will not even have the option of seeking out and then obtaining professional financial advice.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

George Barzizza
Memphis, TN
gbarzizza@farmersagent.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.

Specifically, I work with small business owners who roll-up their sleeves to work. They are unfamiliar with the retirement options and many times, I must remind them dozens of times to act on their best interest to save for retirement. There is no way that these customers will pay for advice for financial services.

- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

Many customers want an advisor to act in their best interest and "get it done for them" without a lot of initial difficulties.

- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

None of my customer will pay up front for advice. They do well just saving $50 per month to start a program.

- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Andrew Van Horn
Lincoln, NE
avanhorn22@yahoo.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Ron Stahl
CLIVE, IA
rstahl@securitiesmail.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kevin Martin
Hiawatha, IA
ksmartin@ft.nyl.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Richard Yost
Eugene, OR
yost_richard@nlvmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Julianne Dahrooge
Worcester, MA
julianne@chan-dahrooge.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Dennis Amstuz
Minden, NE
amstuz@hotmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Robert Smith
Los Angeles, CA
rmsmith@financialguide.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ben Fuhriman
Shelley, ID
fuhriman.ben@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services. My own mother is one of those who would suffer under these rules. She has a small 401k and plans to retire next year. Under these rules, she would have no access to professional advice and would likely make poor decisions without such help. The cons of this regulation highly outweigh the pros.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Randy Roth
new orleans, LA
rroth@gillis.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Steve Borklund
Greenville, SC
steve.borklund.gw5t@statefarm.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I have been in the financial services business for 47 years, the last 45 with State Farm. I spent 22 years in leadership and returned to personal production 20 years ago. Soon after, State Farm got into financial services all the way and I got into financial services all the way with them. I had already completed my CLU several years before, but felt I needed to study for and earn the CFP, which I did and earned the ChFC in the process. I was a CFP Designee for 5 years when the CFP Board changed their standards. We had always been held to a fiduciary standard when doing financial planning, but the change caused State Farm to interpret the fiduciary standard to include property and casualty transactions when a financial plan was done for a current client. Subsequently, they required me to relinquish my CFP marks. What took years and tens of thousands of dollars to acquire, was wiped away with the stroke of a pen.

The DOL is about to do the same thing. Please do not let this happen. There is a distinct difference between holding financial services professionals to a suitability standard and a fiduciary standard. Being held to a fiduciary standard would drive a vast number of financial services professions out of the business. Those who stayed in the business would be severely limited as to their ability to assist clients with their needs.

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

John Paul Caswell
Baton Rouge, LA
jp_caswell@glic.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Karl Drescher
Flower Mound, TX
karl.drescher@adviserfocus.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Recently, I helped Jack decide what to do with his 401(k) account when he terminated employment. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for Jack. I helped Jack decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet his risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Jack would instead just roll his 401(k) into a single Mutual fund based on what he read in the paper, without taking any of his risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and how to combine with his Social Security income to achieve the income level he needed to meet his basic needs if he hadn't had access to my services.

Robert Drake
Beverly Hills, MI
rdrake@sigmarep.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Shelley Parson
Bentonville, AR
sparson@farmersagent.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

William McGreevy
Sioux Falls, SD
bill@mcgreevyassoc.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Emily Woodson
Wilmington, DE
emily@financialhouse.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Neil Wilkinson
Oelwein, IA
nwilkinson@fdg.net
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Trey Kelly Kelly
Atlanta, GA
trekellynaifa@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ryan O'Shea
Salt Lake City, UT
ryan@osheeadvisory.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

William Ashworth
LAKELAND, TN
william.ashworth.tfry@statefarm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Representative:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Matthew Meeker
Whitehouse, OH
mmeeker@financialguide.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

My experience as a registered representative over the past 32 years is exclusively commission-based. I have not charged a fee for advice. My recommendations come after discussing all of my client's relevant facts and reviewing their needs, habits and risk profile. Getting paid for my work is a natural result of listening carefully, offering sensible and appropriate tools to help clients reach their goals with safety in mind. The client's best interests are always at the forefront of this process. Hampering the free and open discussion that individuals need to assess their choices with professionals like myself is not beneficial to desired outcome. Insisting that broker-dealers monitor their representative, suggesting that affiliations in groups like NAIFA and SFSP or advanced credentials such as CLU, ChFC, CFP are healthy indicators for the public to assess the worth of the professional they select would be more congruent with the DOL objectives.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Tom Gearhart
Marion, IN
tom.gearhart@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many people without access to professional education, advice and services.

The people in my community need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. My clients are too small to afford these fees.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance I, as an advisor, can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. As an advisor, I must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

I work with mainstream Americans, this rule, as written, will cut them off from the help and work I now provide.

Norman Plotkin
Atlanta, GA
nplotkin@ashfordadvisors.net
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Sherry Flynn
BLOOMFIELD, NM
sherry.flynn@voyafa.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Randy Johnston
savanna, IL
randy.johnston@countryfinancial.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Ken Schmocker
Lacrosse, WI
ken@schmockerfinancial.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

James Noe
Western Springs, IL
jnoe@lincolninvestment.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Lawrence Stack
Farmington Hills, MI
ljstackclu@aol.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Chuck Olson
omaha, NE
chuck@ociservices.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Lee Bowman
Sikeston, MO
lee.a.bowman.jr@mwarep.org
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Joe Aldridge Bloomington, IN
joseph.aldridge@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Stephan Sabo
Iowa City, IA
stephan.sabo@northstarfinancial.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Daniel Djakov
Glendale, NY
ddjakov@ft.newyorklife.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Larry Altman
Minnetrista, MN
la@fortunefin.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Joy Gardner
Reno, NV
jgardner@comstockins.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jenna Barker
Minneapolis, MN
jenna.barker@northstarfinancial.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Bryan Daniel
Winston salem, NC
bryandaniel@bellsouth.net

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Zack Bambarly
Philadelphia, PA
zack.bambarly@northstarfinancial.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Gabrielle Tarantino
dallas, TX
jgtarantino@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Chad Henke
Cologne, MN
chad.henke@thrivent.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

William Woods
Madison, WV
wlwoods@ft.newyorklife.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Stacy Nichols Rosedale, LA
stacy.russo@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Dennis Wells
Ladson, SC
wells-ins@sc.rr.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Recently, I helped a client, Gayle decide what to do with her 401(k) account when she terminated employment. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for Gayle. I helped Gayle decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet Gayle's risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds and an annuity. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Gayle would instead just cash out her 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if she hadn't had access to my services.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Nathan Hinesman
Harpster, OH
nathan@thehinesmangroup.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Dennis McCarty
Grand Island, NE
dennis@primarkagency.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I have been in the Financial Services area for thirty four plus years and I wish to comment on the DOL's proposed rule for those of us who have helped many individuals with their retirement programs, albeit large accounts or small accounts.

While there may be some valid concern that individuals working in the field of Financial Services area need to have guidelines with which to conduct their business I am finding it interesting that the guidelines being proposed are going to hinder not only the Advisors from wanting to conduct any type of activity in the retirement area , but the consumer and investors will be left to make uneducated decisions without all the facts that can help them in their planning because the Advisors won't be there for them.

My clients looked to me to give them solid, honest, thought provoking advise on what to do with their monies in IRA's , 401(k) rollovers, and general savings for the future. In advising my clients you as rule makers need to know that people are seeking security because of the uncertainty of todays economy both locally and in the worlds arena. Helping them to feel safe with what they have accumulated thus far is the goal of I have as a Financial Advisor, and when we can accomplish that we are compensated accordingly, not because of the products we have used to reach that level of security but because our clients have trusted in our products and recommendations for them!

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement. To be honest, a fee service arrangement is a difficult subject to broach because what is acceptable to one person may not be acceptable to another like person I work with. Who determines what my worth to the client should be for the knowledge and the years of experience I have? I haven't a clue on what to charge a client as a fee for my thirty-four years plus within the Financial Services field. Some could afford what I think I am worth and others could not. So what do I do with the could not's?

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jim Hutson
Amarillo, TX
jim@jimhutsonagency.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

I work with many private sector employees, helping them position their retirement plans (401k, 403b, IRA plans). I am a commission based advisor, and I fear that the proposed rule change would preclude me from assisting these retirees at the time of retirement by providing rollover advice and assistance. Most of my clients are either blue collar workers or professional educators. They need the help of advisors like me, and most would not pay a fee for assistance. Commission-based advisors should be able to provide such services.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Emily Johnson
Wellman, IA
ejohnson@tfamail.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Karen Haigh
Yorba Linda, CA
khaigh@pacbell.net
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Merlin Kastens
Elk Horn, IA
kia@metc.net

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kevin Schneider
Marlborough, MA
kevinschneider@bulfinchgroup.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. Recently, I helped a long term client decide what to do with his 401(k) account in anticipation of entering retirement. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice. I helped him decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet his risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, income requirements, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. As a part of the strategy, I received commissions from the purchase of an annuity. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Keith Gillies
New Orleans, LA
kmgillies@aol.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients. As a CFP, I understand the fiduciary relationship I have with my clients as the vast majority pay me a fee. However, we work with many of their rank and file employees to provide quality, low cost advice. If our advisors working with these mostly middle class employees were forced to operate under the proposed rule, they would decline.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data

retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

David Larson
Hattiesburg, MS
dlarson@ft.newyorklife.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Robert Hirsh
Hudson, OH
robhirsh@roadrunner.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Recently, I helped Lisa decide what to do with her 401(k) account when she terminated employment. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for her. I helped Lisa decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet her risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I will receive commissions from the purchase of mutual funds. Under the current proposed rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Lisa would instead just cash out her 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if she hadn't had access to my services.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Alex Marchan
Milwaukee, WI
alex.marchan@nm.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

DARLENE Hanes
Boynton Beach, FL
dmhcluchfc@comcast.net
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Chad Troester
PAPILLION, NE
catroester@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Ralph Pitts
Lyman, SC
ralph.pitts@bankerslife.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Bill Broich
Olympia, WA
bbroich@msn.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jennifer Williams
Houston, TX
jenwilliams9@hotmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

lesley day
cary, NC
lesley.day@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jonathan Lohman
Rock Island, IL
jonathan@lohman-companies.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Sahand Elmtalab
MINNEAPOLIS, MN
sahandelmtalab@mecatalyst.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

On multiple recent occasions, I have helped clients decide what to do with their 401(k) accounts when they have separated from employment. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for some of these clients. I helped them decide how to invest the IRA accounts to best meet their financial situations, tax statuses, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds and/or annuities. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Jane would instead just cash out her 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if she hadn't had access to my services. Moreover, the wrong investment choices could be made as well.

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

David Janson
Reese, MI
david.c.janson@mwarep.org
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Marco Mazzone
Brecksville, OH
mmazzone@royalaa.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Alan Tuchmann
North Haven, CT
alan.tuchmann@nm.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

James Gaydosh
N. Royalton, OH
jgaydosh@caioh.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Matthew Echelmeier
Lansdale, PA
echins1@aol.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Now, more than ever, the general public needs our services. Yes, we expect to get paid, but our investment expertise is needed by them. We always put our client's goals and wants first!! We are an extremely valuable resource to your constituents!

Donald Klaas
Chesterfield, MO
donald.klaas@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Cynthia Watson
Cicero, IN
cyndi.watsonagency@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

A lot of times I help the Farmers make decisions in investing money in an Annuity for their retirement in much later years of their life. They appreciate my honesty in me working for them instead of what I can get out of the sale.

Jose R Rodriguez
Beavercreek, OH
rafi.rodriguez@securitiesamerica.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Phillip McDuffee
Austin, TX
shaun.mcduffee@northstarfinancial.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Brandon Lawrence
CLEARWATER, MN
brandon@jacobs-financial.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Kathy Carlson
Exeter, NH
kcarlson@uuinc.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Terry Flack
Greensburg, PA
flackt@nationwide.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Michael Scannell
Toms River, NJ
michaels@mycollegeplan.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Bruce Himelman
Waretown, NJ
bruce.himelman@nm.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

John Tillman Brick, NJ
johnt@mycollegeplan.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jason May Muncie, IN
jason.may.hlcx@statefarm.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Erik Siverson
Saint Paul, MN
erik@northstarfinancial.com

07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Gordon Colburn
San Dimas, CA
gcolb@aol.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Tyler Vongsawad
Provo, UT tyler.vongsawad@nm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Bill Cunningham CLU,ChFC,CFP,AEP
Shreveport, LA
bill.cunningham@nm.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

In closing the unintended consequence of this rule will be that many people will be limited in the professional advice that they receive. When I make a recommendation to a client it is based upon my knowledge of their situation including their goals, time horizon and risk tolerance. In addition to that I bring substantial knowledge to the table for the benefit of my clients including 4 professional designations and 60-100 hours of continuing education. The regulation in its present state would limit the services and expertise that our clients currently enjoy.

Ben Daniels
Sandy, UT
daniels.ben@principal.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

William Beemer
Stanwood, MI
wtbeemer@financialguide.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kendra Robinette
Denver, CO
kendra.robinette@horacemann.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Sam Rincker Indpls, IN
srincker@financialguide.com

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Daniel Reisinger, CLU, ChFC
LANDENBERG, PA
finsrv@comcast.net

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Wayne Schmidt
Mandeville, LA
wayne@anbrokerage.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Todd Gentner
Onsted, MI
tgentner@kapnick.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Maxwell Stowe
Minnetonka, MN
maxstowe@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: MY THOUGHTS! Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Perez, Fraken, Klobuchar and Paulsen:

Besides the boilerplate statement below let me add this; not only is our financial industry one of the most difficult to obtain success within, we also deal with some of the most rigorous regulation, testing and ongoing training to maintain our licenses. The investment and insurance industries are ever changing and without trained and equally compensated individuals in this field the general public will be under-served in their financial planning through most of their lives.

It is neither poor markets nor commissions/fees that jeopardizes many retirements but general education regarding a lifetime of savings that it takes to support ones self for 20-40 years in retirement. I've advised and "COACHED" many over the last ten years to do thing they rather not, as saving money does not feel as rewarding as spending as we are all so accustomed to doing. I've ran 401K plans, IRA's and sold insurance for a number of years and it is not get rich quick industry. The proposed legislation will continue to challenge the industry and be a step backwards for all whom must seek advice in this complicated facets of our lives.

As educated members of our society you should easily be able in short summary email me back and explain the simple investment concept of an NUA transaction; pre or post retirement. If you cannot, I would seriously reconsider this piece of legislation as many need our advice on more than just this one simple matter. Remember, it's not only investments and insurance we must understand, but also tax law and accounting. THANK YOU!

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

James G. Peterson
Milton, WV
jpeterso@marshakk.edu

07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Mark Ormsby
elk grove, CA
mark.e.ormsby@mwarep.org
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Maxwell Schmitz
Richmond, CA
maxwell@di-ltc.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Max Clifford
Decatur, GA
clifford.max26@gmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Joe Van Deusen Westfield, IN
jvandeusen@financialguide.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Senator Coats, Senator Donnelly, Representative Brooks and Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for years, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients. Many of them are no longer in qualified plans where I first met them, but continue to work with me because of the relationship and trust that was established during that time that they were a participant in my plan. Trust is such a vitally important part of this industry and an individual's comfort level and to enact action that would subsequently cause advisors to not further advise or take care of current participants, due to fiduciary restriction or lack of the ability to make an income of sorts would be devastating.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers

and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

When I work with in-plan participants, most people do not pay attention with the same level of scrutiny that they do in our one on one meetings after they leave a plan. It becomes much more personal and relevant to them at that point. Please, please, please simplify this legislation before considering passing a bill of this nature. Also, consider how inclined you would be if you were eliminated the opportunity to earn income while working in your profession. I feel you would strongly reconsider how you would spend your time as well! It is an unintended consequence that would remove the trusted relationships that are established in this industry.

Nathan Lorenz
Sikeston, MO
nml4life@yahoo.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Ronan Marra
Fishers, IN
ronan@gemmerwm.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Donald Boisvert
Hooksett, NH
boisvert_donald@nlvmail.com
07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Rich Courter
Blacklick, OH
rich@richcourterins.com

07/06/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Dusty Cook
omaha, NE
cook.dusty@principal.com
07/06/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jeffrey Ling
Honolulu, HI
jling@finsvcs.com
07/06/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisers from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Erin Rogers
Ragley, LA
ididntdoit83@gmail.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

David Taraborelli
North Providence, RI
dptaraborell@ft.newyorklife.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Wanda Vining-Alber
Jamestown, ND
wanda_viningalber@us.aflac.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Christine Guessford
Town and Country, MO christine_guessford@glic.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of our advisors putting their clients first. Their clients, many of whom they have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that their advisor has their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be their clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Kirk Johnston
Vanderbilt, MI
kjohnston392@gmail.com

07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Fred Russell
Binghamton, NY
frussell@htk.com

07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Robert Dickinson Broken Arrow, OK
robert.l.dickinson@mwarep.org
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Ryan Mohrmann
Fraser, CO
ryan.mohrmann@thrivent.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Robert Dollar
Stockbridge, GA
r.david.dollar@mwarep.org
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees. I help people always to do what is in their best interest and I do not need the Government to help me be honest and caring about the futures of my clients. Plus, clients are confused enough as is, and they need trust worthy advisors to help them along the way. Again, please re-write our STOP the damaging regulations.

Anthony Haider
Blaine, MN
ahaider1@metlife.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Gregory Marchand
Worcester, MA
greg@marchandfinancial.com

07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Michael Ross
Lexington, MA
mikeross70@hotmail.com

07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Tim Jordan
Huntingdon, TN
timothy.j.jordan@mwarep.org
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Dan Koenig houston, TX
dan@dantanna.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jamuna Kennedy
Rochester, MI
jamunakennedy@yahoo.com

07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Daniel Lewis
North Mankato, MN
dlowis@wradvisors.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Joanne Adcock
Hampstead, NC
joanne.m.adcock@mwarep.org
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

I have recently been receiving referrals from a community bank to take care of their investment clients as they do not provide this service. The bank officials have been extremely pleased with the personal service, including an education into investing, I have been providing their clients. The education and advice I provide these people is paramount in terms of them growing their money, otherwise they would be cashing in their savings due to lack of knowledge of how and where to move it. The whole purpose of 401K savings vehicles was to supplement the social security system and if these people do not receive help, especially when leaving a job and having to move it, there will be no "extra" savings. Almost ALL the folks I deal have reported they never did anything with the funds because they became frustrated from the start and abandoned the process. Taking this help away from the individual is wrong and NOT in the best interest of the people.

Additionally, the proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Daniel Turnmeyer
Davenport, IA
dlturnmeyer@financialguide.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Samuel Liang
Newton, MA
sam@rubinoandliang.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez, Senator Markey and Senator Warren:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services. I believe this will hurt, rather than help, many hard-working, middle-income Americans.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure. I recently helped a 62 year old woman who was retired and needed assistance with what to do with her 401k. She needed monthly income. We rolled over her 401k to an IRA and used a fixed annuity that would provide her with a steady stream of income. She wanted to keep things simple, and that was the reason she didn't want to go to some big brokerage firm or investment adviser. I received commissions from the purchase of the annuity which paid for my time. For over 20 years, I've been providing this type of service for many middle-income Americans.

Unfortunately, the current draft - I would be prohibited from providing any of the services I listed above. Because of that, it's likely that my client would not have rolled over her 401k, and simply cashed it out of it, thereby suffering early withdrawal penalties and paying all the income taxes at once. This is clearly the wrong decision, but my guess is that under the new proposed regulations, many people would have to do the same thing, as they would no longer to have access to the type of services I provide. In addition to the issues listed below, the proposed rule would jeopardize the livelihood of hundreds of thousands of hard-working folks like myself who have worked for many years to provide sound options for their clients.

Also under the current draft, the following bullet points have unintended consequences:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Joshua Tomeoni
Lake Oswego, OR
jtomeoni@gmail.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. As a preface, I currently am a fiduciary for my clients having the highest securities licenses available and my CFP designation. I'm concerned, however, that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Before I bullet point a few changes that might be beneficial, let me share an example:

Recently, my client Tom introduced me to his employer, JK, to help with their 401(k) plan. This was a huge deal to the employer as this was the primary retirement savings vehicle that everyone in his employment had, so he wanted to make sure it was doing it's very best to accomplish that goal for his employees. After extensive research, we found that the current plan was a bit outdated & more expensive than it needed to be, mainly because it was created by someone who had not kept up with current trends in the marketplace. We are currently designing a new plan to lower fees, give more investment options, and better help control investments so people's hard earned money does not drop dramatically if and when there is another large market drop. JK is thrilled with the work we did and Tom has decided that since he is near retirement, rolling his 401(k) account into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for him. I helped Tom, like JK, decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet his risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the help I gave on the 401(k) and the purchase of mutual funds and an annuity within the IRA. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that JK's 401(k) would sit in an inferior and exposed situation and many of his employees, including Tom, would likely be paying higher fees, taking more risk, & having less advice.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Susie Ricke
Greensburg, IN
susie@susiericke.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Recently, I helped one of my clients decide what to do with her 401(k) account when she terminated employment. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for Teresa. I helped her decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet her risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds and an annuity. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Teresa would instead just cash out her 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if she hadn't had access to my services.

Please strongly consider rewriting this bill as these people depend on us and trust us to help in these types of situations.

William Hall
Parker, CO
wrhall@ft.newyorklife.com

07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Luke Stromquist
Fort Collins, CO
luke.stromquist@countryfinancial.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Gregory Smith
Amsterdam, NY
gwsmith@ft.newyorklife.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Robert Swartzbaugh
Omaha, NE
bob.swartzbaugh@swartzbaugh.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Graham Wright
Livermore, CA
graham.wright@thrivent.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I often help middle- and low-income clients in their transition from working to retirement. I may recommend a rollover of 401k/403b assets into mutual funds, brokerage, life insurance and/or annuities. We take into account their tax status, legacy desires, need for guaranteed income, risk tolerance, etc. The new rules will greatly increase the cost/risk of advising middle and low income clients leaving them with less access to financial education and advice.

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

thomas rickard
honea path, SC
thomas.a.rickard@mwarep.org
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Nicole Holland-Hong Fairview heights, IL, IL nicole.holland@nm.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Brian Hubbell
Spokane, WA
brian.hubbell@nm.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I've been in this industry for over three decades and the current DOL proposal will not be good for the American public. Please read below...

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

John Ficalora
Dobbs Ferry, NY
jficalora@mac.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Patrick Holmay
Minneapolis, MN
pat.holmay@jacobsongroupmn.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Peter Sullivan
Helena, MT
peterw@sullivanfinancialgroup.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Lonnie Sesskin
West Palm Beach, FL
lonnie.sesskin@prudential.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Bryan King FIC
Canadian, TX
bryan.h.king@mwarep.org
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Stan Benfell
Salt Lake City, UT
stan@beaconsuccess.com

07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Scott Wolf
Maple Grove, MN
scott_wolf@fosterklima.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Thomas Ripperda
Belleville, IL
ripperda67@aol.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I agree with great protection for the consumers, but this rule is unworkable and confusing. Under this new rule, I would not be able to make recommendation on retirement plans with triggering the fiduciary rules. This proposal will be most harmful to the low balance savers. Consider the client that has $50 a month to put into a IRA. Where will they get advise if they no experience with investments? Their course of action will be no action. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Mark Elder
Frisco, TX
mdelder@ft.newyorklife.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Over the years, I have served my clients, like Scott, with their financial decisions. I've done so by educating them so they are equipped with information they need. In many cases, like Scott's, we were able to look at how moving his old 401(k) to an IRA was better for him than cashing it out. Without my guidance, he would have done so, and not have any of the assets he has in his IRA today. Our clients need help and we have a responsibility to them to be able to provide it without restrictions this legislation will put on us.

Don Lekvold
Scobey, MT
dlekvold@ft.newyorklife.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

George P.
Hurricane, WV
george@georgepsmith.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Roya Moltaji
Minneapolis, MN
rmoltaji@melife.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Elected Official:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Michael Skorupski
Aurora, CO
mskorupski@farmersagent.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jim Zara
Chesterfield, MO
jim.zara@nm.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

sandra koenig cape guitar deal, MO
sjkoenig2@gmail.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Lennie Roe
Huntington, WV
lennie@roeins.net
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Randon Rocks
Centennial, CO
randon@seylininsurancegroup.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Mark Jensen
Granite Falls, MN
mark.jensen@thrivent.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Donald Van Gorder, Jr.
Haslett, MI
avangorder@brvassociates.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients. I have served my clients in this manner for over 31 years.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans. This would be another barrier for employers who want to provide retirement benefits because of added cost to the employer.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Dudley Williamson
Hattiesburg, MS
dswilliamson@ft.newyorklife.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Doug Fisher
Clarksville, IN
doug@limittherisk.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

It is my belief that education and understanding are the cornerstones to sound decision making. Over the past several years I have been able to help over 100 customers review where they are, assess where they want to be and realign their options. Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Should you wish to contact me for any additional information please feel free.

Cynthia Masterson
Highlands Ranch, CO
cmasterson4@gmail.com

07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Stephanie Dickison
Midvale, UT
stephaniejoe3@comcast.net
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Karen Bryan
WINTER HAVEN, FL
karen.bryan.bhnu@statefarm.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Wanda Vining-Alber
Jamestown, ND
wanda_viningalber@us.aflac.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Harold Ryley
Coal Valley, IL
hryley@metlife.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Scott McDonald
Scarborough, ME
scott.m.mcdonald@mwarep.org
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Steven Ruiz
Mandeville, LA
srockruiz@yahoo.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

James Wright
Sterling, CO
jim.wright@thrivent.com

07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jacob Wright
Sterling, CO
jacob.wright@thrivent.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Stanley Haselman
Ottawa, OH
stanley.haselman@mwarep.org
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Paula Kurecka
Mansfield, TX
pkureckafinance@sbcglobal.net

07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Gianpaolo von Nacher
playa del rey, CA
gianni@michelfinancial.com

07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Michael Sinclair
Naples, FL
michael@sinclair-financial.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jonathan Wendt
Grand Rapids, MI
jonathan.wendt@lpl.com

07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Octavio Santos
Miramar, FL
osantos@metlife.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Thomas Meyers
Rock Island, IL
tom.meyers@modern-woodmen.org
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Patrick Barnes
Bettendorf, IA
bradfordpanther@mchsi.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Robert Dollar
Stockbridge, GA
r.david.dollar@mwarep.org
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Recently, I helped Cindy decide what to do with her 401(k) account when she terminated employment. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for Cindy. I helped Cindy decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet Cindy's risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of an annuity. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Cindy would instead just cash out her 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if she hadn't had access to my services. I'm sure as upright American Politicians and regulators, you want what is BEST for our fellow citizens, not the Governments bank account.

Harry Robinson
Deerfield Beach, FL
harrymr3@comcast.net
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

On a personal note: If someone does work for another person they should be paid for doing the work. Commissions are the way we are paid. Why is our government interfering with free enterprise? Especially when your doing what's right for a person. Our forefathers would never accept what you are trying to do and if you had a conscience you wouldn't either. Let me not even get into the fact that the DOL is involving themselves into something that I don't believe should be there responsibility.

Dustin Will
Lincoln, NE
dustin@benefit-management.com

07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Please find below my thoughts and recommendations, and thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

I am passionate about my career and the role that I play in serving my clients. I have served several individuals that lost contact with their advisor in a good will effort so that they may get the help that they deserve. During these instances, I received no compensation for advice rendered even though it was extremely valuable to these clients. I am able to do this because eventually some of these clients will expand their relationship with me or provide a referral to others. However, this altruistic approach would not be feasible under your proposal. Ultimately, not enough people seek us out!!! My phone does not ring unless its someone calling me back. If I add into that equation an upfront contract or an immediate fee structure, my barriers to client acquisition will dramatically increase. In my heart I know that people need me, and I can help (the internet is not the solution for most, because more than information, they need motivation, coaching, teaching and to some extent parenting!)

I did not enter this profession to help rich people get richer. However, under the your proposal, that is essentially the safest and most profitable business model to pursue. I simply cant afford to help the small investor because my cost of doing business will be too high (already I pay almost $2000/yr for E&O insurance, and I'm not performing surgery in my financial practice!!), my liability risk too great (even if I am competent and make prudent recommendations, we live in an age where a desperate individual can find a litigious angle!), and my time constraints too great (if every recommendation must be the absolute best and not just a very good prudent option, I will be researching and preparing options too extensively to be appropriately compensated through a relationship with smaller investors).

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.

- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.
- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.
- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.
- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Brandon Handy
Syracuse, UT
brandon.handy@allegisfp.com

07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

John Peacock
Cranston, RI
jnpeacock@peacockfinancialgroupllc.com

07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Recently, I help Lorie decide what to do with her 401(k) and ROTH (401K). I helped her decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet Lorie's risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received advisory fees and commissions from the purchase of mutual funds. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Lorie would instead just cash out her 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if she hadn't had access to my services.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Brendan E. McCarthy
Wellesley, MA
brendan@mccarthyfinancialllc.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Michael McGinnis
Rapid City, SD
mcginnis.mike@princor.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

P.S. Start taking a stand against mediocrity within the Government. How will you be remembered? How will your grand kids and beyond perceive your actions in representing South Dakota?

Steven W. Thomas Thomas
Windsor, CO
steve.thomas@planamerica.biz
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

John P. Steele
Manhattan, MT
jpsteele@mebcinc.com

07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Troy Sprenger
Dubuque, IA
tasprenger@ft.newyorklife.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

James Tollerton
Sarasota, FL
jim@professionalbenefits.org
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

As I read the current proposal of the DOL regarding changing the "Fiduciary" Rule, I find that the practical impact would be adverse for the overwhelming majority of our clients. We service several thousand individuals and businesses, as well as governmental entities regarding investments, qualified and retirement plans, including the Sarasota County Sheriff's Department, Sarasota Manatee Airport Authority, and a number of private employers.

We provide educational service to ALL participants regarding their options and rationale for participating, particularly where participation is optional, i.e. their own deferrals and investments. We do not charge additional "fees" for such service. At transition times, i.e. termination, withdrawal, death or disability our continued counsel is critical to the client to understand their options and choices.

The proposed rule would make such counsel more difficult and expensive for the clients.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write the proposed rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

James Scully
Hiawatha, IA
james.scully50@gmail.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

David Walter Miami, FL
dwalter@ft.newyorklife.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

John Mosley
Westbrook, ME
john@mosleyfinancialgroup.com

07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Robert Ross
Aurora, CO
bob@rsma.biz

07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

walt berry stratford, TX walt.a.berry@mwarep.org
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Mark Wolpert
Maple Grove, MN
mwolpert@metlife.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Tracy L. Kelley LUTCF
Vienna, WV
tracykelley@allstate.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Frances Gardner
dallas, TX
fgardner@htk.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Sirs,

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

David Finnell
Indianapolis, IN
david@davidfinnell.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

My letter is not entirely a copy of others you may be receiving. I am writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Because the norm is that there are multitudes of individuals, like myself, who are licensed, trained, qualified, certified, and trustworthy agents primarily selling life insurance products for retirement saving, it would be in error to presume that the necessity of the rules in protecting consumers should blithely override my ability to make a living.

A rug being pulled out from under so many agents' feet is absolutely the wrong approach to improving the fiduciary quality of advice. This may be a case of the very few ruining it for the vast many.

Just this year, I gave sound advice to an individual who accepted an early retirement package from his company and asked me what he should do with his 401(k). My advice was based on experience and education corresponding to my professional training and licensing. I stood to make no commission or profit in any way on the advice because I am not licensed where he lives. Under the proposed rules, I would feel like I was in danger of inappropriate conduct for simply helping him to understand his options and decide what to do. It is unconscionable to me that some new rule could devastate my career so unexpectedly.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Lucas Quaccia
Fresno, CA
lquaccia@ft.newyorklife.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Aaron Lauck
St. Louis, MO
aaron.lauck@gmail.com

07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Corban Roache
Hingham, MA
croache@dmi.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Gail Woodruff
Mt. Pleasant, MI
gail.a.woodruff@mwarep.org
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

bernard tobin chesterfielcd, MO
b4456@earthlink.net
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Doug Berry
Chesterfield, MO
douglas.berry@nm.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Steven Hartman
Fargo, ND
srhartman@ft.newyorklife.com

07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Terry Mathias
Charleston, WV
tsmathias@ft.newyorklife.com

07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Richard Hall
Strawberry Plains, TN
richard.d.hall@mwarep.org
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Hollis Inglett, Jr.
Ormond Beach, FL
hollis@haywardbrown.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jack VandenBroek
Grand Rapids, MI
jackvb1@gmail.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Dwaine Meyer
Omaha, NE
meyerdew@cox.net
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Robert Gutshall
Parsons, WV
bob.gutshall.bv81@statefarm.com

07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Wayne Tanaka
Kailua, HI
wtanaka@financialguide.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Clint Hinderaker
Coralville, IA
hinderaker.clint@principal.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Tom Newton
Soquel, CA
newtontom@sbcglobal.net
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Robert Railsback
Pismo Beach, CA
rob.railsback.dyqv@statefarm.com

07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Trent Speckman
Ft Myers, FL
trent@speckmanfinancialgroup.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

In short, this Rule does not help our clients (and the general public) but rather puts them in a much worse position. Is this the goal of the government?

Jeffrey Roberts
Bellbrook, OH
jeff@jeffmroberts.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Charlie Bufkin
Lucedale, MS
clbufkinjr@woodmen.org
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Chris Elhardt
Ham Lake, MN
chris_elhardt@glic.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ron Staebell
Sioux Falls, SD
staebell.ron@principal.com

07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Recently, one of my clients was dismissed from her job w/o much cause. She was not interested in leaving her 401K balance with the employer's plan as she wanted nothing to do with this employer. Her balance was around $23,000. I assisted her with rolling over this balance to a conservative mutual fund because of her low risk tolerance. In this example, she would have had to accomplish this on her own under RIN 1210-AB32 as a fee arrangement would not have made sense.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jeffrey Andrews
Denver, CO
jeffdrewsadvi@outlook.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Brockton Davis
Piedmont, SD
brockton31@hotmail.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Petula Moy
Virginia Beach, VA
moy_petula@nlvmail.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kevin Bailey
Santa Barbara, CA
klbailey@ft.newyorklife.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jeff Rushing
Marion, IL
jeffrey.s.rushing@mwarep.org
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Nathan Moody
Gorham, ME
nmoody@ft.newyorklife.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Criag Marmie
Lincoln, NE
cmarmie1@gmail.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Gretchen Rehm
Mankato, MN
gretchen.rehm@horacemann.com

07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Denwood Parrish
Melbourne, FL
naifa1890spacecoast@gmail.com

07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly, and difficult, if not impossible, to realize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice, and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement, thus requiring the employer to incur a fee for services.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, and assist in selecting the investment options available to participants. Cost is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid commissions, 12b-1 fees, or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third-party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance, and investment options available in their workplace retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify any specific investment, even as an example of the type or class of investment that can meet the employee's retirement objectives. The rule thus transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors must be able to discuss with their clients and prospects specific investment choices prior to making a recommendation and contemplating a specific choice.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited-transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that both the advisor and the advisor's financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. The rule as drafted, however, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, requiring the employee to roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased.

In this example the consumer would bear a smaller cost for a commission than for an ongoing asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations permits compensation by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be realized as currently drafted. A new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation, such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and, in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit fiduciaries who offer investment advice to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model where the DOL sees a conflict. Therefore, the DOL must provide a workable exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution, and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before making any recommendations, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. Execution of the contract should occur only after discussion of a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives, and financial options, and also after the client's decision on a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jamie Wyatt
Nashville, TN
jamie.e.wyatt@mwarep.org
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

Recently, I helped a client named Maggie decide what to do with her 401(k) account when she terminated employment. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for her. I helped Maggie decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet Maggie's risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds and an annuity. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Maggie would instead just cash out her 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if she hadn't had access to my services.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ross Welte
Richfield, MN
ross_welte@fosterklima.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Pamela Frost
Bowdon, GA
pamela.l.frost@mwarep.org

07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Peter Smith
SOUTH LYON, MI
pete@eyeonargus.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Recently, I helped Tracy decide what to do with her 401(k) account when she terminated employment. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for Tracy. I helped Tracy decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet her risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds and an annuity. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Tracy would instead just cash out her 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if she hadn't had access to my services. It would have also been impossible to set up the proper financial vehicles to care for Tracy's special needs son for the long term .

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

GARY WRIGHT
LONETREE, CO
gwright@farmersagent.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Henry Taylor
Arden, NC
joseph.taylor@allstate.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kathleen Apodaca
Albuquerque, NM
kapodaca@foothillsecurities.com

07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Michele Fanelli
Surprise, AZ
michele.fanelli.gh0m@statefarm.com

07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

John Walsh
Seaford, NY
jfwjr47@verizon.net
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Bill Johnston
Austin, TX
bill@johnstonassociatesadvisors.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

How do they expect commission based advisors to make a living? Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Allison Ott
Sand Creek, MI
apickle@tc3net.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

C.Wade Dixon
Greenville, SC
carlas.dixon@bankerslife.com

07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Sarah Anderson
Richland Center, WI sanderson05@ft.newyorklife.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Randi Jo Bohnert
Colona, IL
randijohnson23@gmail.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Robert E. Heiderman
Fish Creek, WI
robert.heiderman@nm.com

07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Peter White
Charleston, WV
bwhite@pfinancial.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Pat Mozden
South Daytona, FL
patmozden@cfl.rr.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

It is important to note that many of the individuals covered by employer 401k plans are "small savers" who would not typically be using financial planners. Therefore, we are providing the only financial information they receive.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Financial advisor
Lake Elmo, MN
joesmith@hotmail.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors. We help our clients make good decisions on how to invest given their needs. For example, we discover their risk tolerance, budget, liquidity needs, and desires during retirement. We help people plan and save money to live how they desire. We help people with IRA rollovers so they don't take distributions early or cash out their savings for unnecessary spending. Please don't put this into effect.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data

retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Ted Laws
Austin, TX
terry.l.laws@mwarep.org
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Lonnie Tutsch
New Underwood, SD
lonnie.l.tutsch@mwarep.org
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jami Siegfried
Parker, CO
jsiegfried@farmersagent.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Peg Fraser Financial Representative
North Liberty, IA peg.fraser@countryfinancial.com

07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a 8 years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Brent Huddleston
Colorado Springs, CO
brent.huddleston.h0q0@statefarm.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

John Curry
Schaumburg, IL
john@kappelinsurance.com

07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Zachary Tritz
Missoula, MT
ztritz@ft.newyorklife.com

07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Barb Woith
Great Falls, MT
bwoith@yahoo.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Gregory D Mallett
Topeka, KS
gregory.d.mallett@mwarep.org
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Taylor Collins
Sarasota, FL
taylor@professionalbenefits.org
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Larry Minarsich
Bernalillo, NM
larry.minarsich@lpl.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Stan Burns
Kissimmee, FL
sburns9664@aol.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kevin McCoy
Seekonk, MA
mccoykevin7@comcast.net
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Lisa Mancinelli Hollidaysburg, PA
lisa@lisamancinelli.com

07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Danny Nungesser
Newnan, GA
daniel.nungesser.ii@mwarep.org
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

William Doy
Moline, IL
bill.doy@modern-woodmen.org
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I've been a licensed agent in the state of Illinois for 39 years and have seen a lot of mistakes that consumers will make regarding investments without the help of a trained advisor. We cannot let the proposed rule go through or it will be devastating for the very people we try to serve.

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data

retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Todd Edmundson
Tuscola, IL
todd.edmundson@countryfinancial.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Robert Holton
Huntington, WV
robert.n.holton@mwarep.org
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

David Matte
Danville, VT
david.a.matte@mwarep.org
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kevin Jones
Wexford, PA
kevin.l.jones@mwarep.org
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for many years, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Debi Hewitt
Dalton, GA
dj.hewitt73@gmail.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Matthew Benson
Brentwood, TN
mbbenson@wellnessfa.com

07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

June Ponder
Seneca, SC
june@alumni.clemson.edu
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

IN REGARDS TO THE ABOVE LETTER, I DO NOT SET UP 401K OR SELL RETIREMENT PRODUCT, BUT AS AN EMPLOYEE AND CITIZEN, I DO NEED HELP, ADVICE, DIRECTION WITH THESE ISSUES FROM TIME TO TIME. THE ABOVE PROPOSED RULE WILL MAKE IT MORE DIFFICULT FOR ME TO OBTAIN INFO THAT I NEED TO MAKE WISE DECISIONS. PLEASE RE-WRITE IT TO MAKE IT EASIER FOR PEOPLE LIKE ME TO GET WHAT I NEED WHEN I NEED IT.

Matthew Boland
marshall, IL
matthew.boland@countryfinancial.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Patrick Hannie
Baton Rouge, LA
patrick.hannie@nm.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ross Byrley
Lake Charles, LA
rossbyrley@gmail.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

David Muilenberg CLU,ChFC,AIF
Grand Rapids, MI
david.muilenberg@lpl.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Clifford Marsteller Elkins, WV innovative@cebridge.net
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

As an advisor about to mark my 30 year anniversary of assisting clients in making financial decisions I am very concerned about many aspects of the proposed rule.

My practice has over 750 clients and of that number, about 550 of them have account balances under $50,000. Many of these folks would not have accumulated anything for retirement had it not been for the encouragement and guidance provided by our firm.

Should the proposed rule be put into place, the time and expense needed to comply and the possibility of increased liability created by the BICE would force us to stop working with the vast majority of our clients with smaller account balances. This is very disturbing to me as many of these clients have been with us for decades and depend on us to help them with financial decisions.

Just a few weeks ago, we had to spend a couple of hours in discussion with a disabled client in his late 50s who wanted to liquidate a significant portion of his liquid retirement account to buy his teenage daughter a car. We explained to him the tax liability this would create and that he needed to preserve assets for his own needs in retirement. We called the auto dealer and discussed loan terms with them and convinced the client that the daughter, who was working, should make the loan payments so that he could preserve his assets. These are things we do above and beyond investment advice, for which we receive no compensation. And there are many more examples of this type of service provide to clients that would not be available to them if we were no longer able to work with them.

Throughout my time in the financial services business I have come to know many advisors and agents and have found the overwhelming majority of them to be very committed to acting in their client's best interest and care deeply about helping those who need our assistance. Many of those I have come to know through my involvement with the National Association of Insurance and Financial Advisors (NAIFA). The remarks below prepared by NAIFA are, I feel a reasonable assessment of the concerning impact of the proposed rule.

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Orion Marx
Sarasota, FL
orion.marx@lfg.com

07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jim Cole
Adrian, MI
jcole@summitfinancialgroup.net
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Anne Ferguson
Sacramento, CA
anne@fergusonlawcorp.com

07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Representative Doris Matsui:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ronald Duswalt
Uniondale, NY
rduswalt@ocfadvisors.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Karla Rasmussen
LENNOX, SD
karla.g.rasmussen@mwarep.org
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Michael Tollerton
Sarasota, FL
michael.tollerton@yahoo.com

07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Peter White
Charleston, WV
pwhite@pfinancial.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Erick Gustafson
palm beach, FL
gustafsone@yahoo.com

07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Abbey Wishau
MAdison, WI
abbey.wishau.pzd8@statefarm.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Steve Caldara
Parker, CO
steve@caldaracompany.com

07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Robert Dollar
Stockbridge, GA
r.david.dollar@mwarep.org
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Cathy Rummel
Belington, WV
crummel1@frontier.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Eric Engstrom
Madison, WI
eengstrom@ft.newyorklife.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Mitchell Bland
Upper Arlington, OH
mitch.bland@lfg.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Many of my clients would have nowhere to turn to for expert financial advice. Especially my older clients who have recently become widowed. Their minds are not thinking logically and if it wasn't for me and my advice they could put their finances in danger.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Roger Hughey
West Branch, MI
rogerdhughey@yahoo.com
07/07/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Diane Gearlds
Tompkinsville, KY
diane.f.gearlds@mwarep.org
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Kallene West
Pueblo, CO
kallene.m.west@mwarep.org
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Toni Stanaland
Seffner, FL
tstanaland@tampabay.rr.com

07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

H. Lillian Vogl
Potomac Falls, VA
lillian.vogl@crump.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. I always put my clients' interests first as an adviser, and many times that meant I got less or no compensation at all for the advice I gave. I also saw how many times clients failed to take action in their own best interest because they were overwhelmed by time-consuming and lengthy compliance requirements. Consumers are very wary of ulterior motives today and rely heavily on recommendations from friends and family to find trustworthy advisers. Adding paperwork and hoops to the process of finding appropriate investment products and advice does not protect them from bad advice, and can lead them to make the fatal mistake of not saving at all or making common investing errors like panic selling.

The proposal is harmful to typical middle market consumers who do most or all of their saving in 401(k)'s and IRAs. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. They need professional advice as much or more than anyone, but fee-based advisors are generally out of their reach.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data

retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Phillip Vance
Roswell, GA
philvance@charter.net
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Brandon Green
Katy, TX
btgreen@gmail.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

ROBERT DONLAN
ALTOONA, PA
rdonlan@thehancockgroup.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Mark Maloney
Alexandria, MN
tmark.maloney@gmail.com

07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Anthony Cisek
jupiter, FL
anthony.cisek@jwccemail.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

This new rule is far too complicated to be successfully implemented. The intentions are good but the reality does not fit. Contracts, databases of information (that is already available online), and oversight will only further complicate an already complicated industry.

My goal is to keep myself in business, and anyone who has built a business from the ground up knows that you need to take care of your clients in order to survive in the long-term. Advisors look out for the interests of their clients---the good ones do. And the ones who operate in self interest do not last.

You can probably paint your house, but you may not be able to do it as well, or as efficiently as the painter that has painted 100 houses. Let the advisors advise. If we need additional oversight, introduce it in small pieces that can be assimilated easily and without undue burden.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jay Schurz Linton, IN
jay.d.schurz@mwarep.org
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for 15 years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Ricky Maique
Houston, TX
ricky.maique.dhn5@statefarm.com
07/07/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Rebecca Sobus
Omaha, NE
rsobus@farmersagent.com
07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services. This is the middle consumer, the individuals that will be hurt the most by this new regulation.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Joseph Nance
Jacksonville, IL
joseph.d.nance@modernwoodmen.org

07/07/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

F. Woods
Hewett, WV
mwalker2@ft.newyorklife.com
07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Leah Hoffert
Billings, MT
lhoffert@retire-solutions.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

James Richards
Marietta, GA
jrrich55@gmail.com
07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Robert J. Beck CPA
Bountiful, UT
rob@capitalmis.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Joe Garrett
corinth, MS
joe.garrett@sfbic.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

William Lenderman III
El Paso, TX
wl3@whc.net

07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Milton L. Knowlton
Memphis, TN
mknowlton@lkfg.com
07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

I have been in the financial services business for over 50 years and giving good honest advice has become more difficult as a result over excessive regulation.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Anthony Burns
Sioux Falls, SD
burns.tony@principal.com
07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Stan Hefner
Parkersburg, WV
stan.hefner@horacemann.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Deborah Reed
Madison, SD
deborah.p.reed@ampf.com
07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. However, I am concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure, especially the small investor that may have limited means to pay for advice that may be cost prohibitive.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.
- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.
- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.
- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Todd Davis
Coconut Creek, FL
tdavis@partnersadvantage.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez: PLEASE READ FIRST PARAGRAPH!

I work in the wholesale insurance industry supporting advisors and agents. Many "Fiduciary" type advisors in my opinion do not have their client's best interest in mind. Having an RIA, series 6 or 7 does not usually secure the "Fiduciary" relationship. Many times a week I speak with an advisor that will not sell any insurance product. They do not even recommend them for lifetime income products and would rather leave their clients' money in the market and at risk for loss.

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Brian Budge
Greenwood Village, CO
brian.budge@nm.com
07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Kevin Conlon
Melville, NY
kconlon@financialguide.com

07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Marcia V Myers LUTCF
Old Bridge, NJ
marciavm13@hotmail.com

07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Larry M. VandeVen CLU, ChFC
Fenton, MO
lvandeven@htk.com

07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services. PLEASE NOTE: The problem with the DOL proposal is not the intended goal of the advisor is acting in the best interest of the client. That is the philosophy for all reputable advisors. At issue is whether the proposed DOL rule is workable for reputable advisors--it is not.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Scott Deru
Morgan, UT
sderu@fbabenefits.com

07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Wayne McCullough
Arlington, TN
wayne@pc4producers.com
07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

John Barada
Saint Louis, MO
jbarada@hfgstl.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Spencer Mack
Orem, UT
smack@financialguide.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for thirty years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

David Ion
Los Osos, CA
insuranceonramp@gmail.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Todd Jones
Centerville, UT
tjones@jonesagencyut.com

07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Christina Swanson
Tampa, FL
cmswanson@outlook.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Michael Crotty
Wrentham, MA
michaelrcrotty@gmail.com
07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Robert Weissbein
Cooper City, FL
bob@completefinancialinc.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Russell Pemberton
WILDWOOD, MO
russellpemberton@gmail.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Edward Barrett
West Caldwell, NJ
e-barr@comcast.net
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Samuel Saied
amarillo, TX
samuel.g.saied@mwarep.org
07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Joel Wolfrom
Hendersonville, NC
joel.wolfrom@gmail.com

07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Clint Wilson
Fishers, IN
clint.wilson.qan9@statefarm.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. I have long term relationships with clients beyond retirement planning and I wouldn't jeopardize my position as their trusted insurance and financial advisor.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Blake Hansen
SLC, UT
bhansen@financialguide.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

dwayne lorenz
sikeston, MO
dclorenz@yahoo.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Gary Fischer
Round Round, TX
gfischer@nationalwesternlife.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Cindy Pennock
Cadet, MO
cindypennock589@yahoo.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Kim Pelkey
Norway, ME
kimlpelkey@aol.com
07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

L Reid Fillmore
Draper, UT
lrfillmore@yahoo.com
07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Christopher DeCola
Syracuse, NY
cdecola@financialguide.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Thomas Fay
Glenview, IL
tfay@stonepointfg.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Thomas Weber
Novato, CA
tsw1291@aol.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Christy Barilotti
Philadelphia, PA
christy@barilottiws.com
07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Bonnie Anderson
Sarasota, FL
bonnie.anderson@lfg.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jeff Boll
Sauk City, WI
jeffrey.boll@mwarep.org
07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Sincerely,

Jeff Boll- FIC
Modern Woodmen of America
Managing Partner
478 Water St.
Prairie du Sac, WI 53578
O: 608-630-9641
F: 608-630-9642
C: 608-393-4288
Jeffrey.boll@mwarep.org
www.modern-woodmen.org
Touching lives, securing futures for over 132 years
<https://www.facebook.com/jeffreybollmodernwoodmen>
www.linkedin.com/in/JeffBollMWA

Jeff Boll
Registered Representative
Securities offered through MWA Financial Services Inc.
A wholly owned subsidiary of Modern Woodmen of America,
1701 1st Avenue, Rock Island, IL 61201
309-558-3100

Member: FINRA, SIPC

Please note any trading instructions left via email will not be executed. To place an immediate trade, please call the MWAFS trading desk at 866-790-7092 between the hours of 8:30 AM and 3:00 PM, Central Standard Time.

"Please note any trading instructions left via email will not be executed. To place an immediate trade, please call the MWAFS trading desk at 866-790-7092 between the hours of 8:30 AM and 3:00 PM, Central Standard Time."

Nikolaus D. Skaer CLU, ChFC, CASL
Freeburg, IL
nikolaus.skaer@nm.com

07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

John Gatewood
St. Louis, MO
john.gatewood@nm.com

07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I have been providing families and investors education and advice on ways to save for their financial future for 34 years. The financial world is more complex today and information so abundant that it can be overwhelming.

If information was all it took for people to save and invest, then everyone would be financially self-reliant. The reality is people need personal coaching. In the same way, if information was all that was needed, then everyone would be physically fit, eat healthy, and avoid tobacco use. Information about healthy living is abundant. So why isn't everyone physically fit who could be? They need a professional to coach them into making the right choices in their best interest and encourage them to make the tough choices when times are tough.

As a Wealth Management Advisor of 34 years and having helped hundreds of families save and invest for their financial future, I believe the standards in the proposed regulation will be too onerous, too expensive, and result in fewer people in need of help not being able to get it for the reasons stated below.

I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Andrew Noga
Indianapolis, IN
andrew.noga@axa-advisors.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Robert Belvedere
Rockville Centre, NY
rlbelvedere@financialguide.com

07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Gary Champa
kirkwood, MO
tawofm@gmail.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Terry Sonnenfeld
Winona, MN
terry@sonnenfeldfinancial.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Please see the letter below: For the past 23 years I have been serving individuals as they save for retirement. Many have small assets that would not qualify for fiduciary managed oversight. Commission based investments properly compensate advisors for the service they provide. I believe the recommendations of the DOL are misguided and cannot provide a benefit to the general public.

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers

and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Richard Benonis
Upper St. Clair, PA
richard.benonis@axa-advisors.com
07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

George F. Poppe III CLU LUTCF Edison, NJ
gfpoppe@aol.com

07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Vicki Tuua
salt Lake City, UT
vicki.tuua.ggvb@statefarm.com

07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

James Horton
Salt Lake City, UT
jhorton743@yahoo.com
07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

James E. Griffin, Jr
Cathedral City, CA
jamesegriffinjr@aol.com

07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Scott D. Colby CLU/ChFC Wichita, KS
scolby@metibp.com
07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Nicholas Aguirre Midvale, UT
slccnic@yahoo.com
07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Andrea Groeneweg
Rock Valley, IA
andrea.r.groeneweg@mwarep.org
07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Lyle Kraft
Minot, ND
lylekraft@min.midco.net
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Justin Normandin
Raymond, NH
justinnormandin@comcast.net
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

John Stevens
Ogden, UT
jms@xmission.com
07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

My clientele is mostly low to middle income citizens. Most will go without advise rather than pay a fee. Please don't disenfranchise the majority of American citizens who need advise and service but will not directly pay for it.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

KIRK HALVERSON
HARRISVILLE, UT
kmhalverson1@gmail.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Karen Spalding
Clayton, MO
karen.spalding@me.com
07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Forrest Pritchett
Paradise, UT
forrest_pritchett@glic.com
07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Nick Delicata
sterling heights, MI
nadelicata@gmail.com
07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Dan Davis
Tulsa, OK
dan.r.davis@mwarep.org
07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jennifer Long
Kearny, NJ
jenniferlong94@gmail.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Charles Terry
Clarksville, TN
chuck@dunninsinc.com

07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

michael sherman
staten island, NY
michal.sherman@mutualofomaha.com

07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jeffrey Hochwalt
Denver, CO
jeff@financialrp.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Kurt Hanson
Las Vegas, NV
kurthanson@financialguide.com
07/08/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

You have probably already been deluged with the message below which delineates all that is wrong with the above referenced proposed DOL Rule. Let me just add that the unintended consequences of this rule will adversely affect the very people it claims it is trying to protect. Please do what you can to prevent this rule from taking root.

Best Regards,

Kurt Hanson

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.
- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.
- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.
- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Charlotte Martin
Pulaski, TN
cmartin@pbsllc.biz
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Lawrence Chalson
Garden City, NY
lchalson@financilaguide.com
07/08/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Fred Kleinfeld
Paramus, NJ
fkleinfeld@metlife.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Larry E Ricke CLU, ChFC
New Albany, IN
lericke@financialguide.com
07/08/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I have been helping clients plan for retirement for 43 years. I feel my advice to clients is valuable and very worthwhile, not only to the client but also their families.

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

