- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Hal Rosen
Sandy, UT
hrosen@rfbmcpa.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Joseph DiLeo
Williamsville, NY
jdileo@financialguide.com

07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Mark Chingren
Fort Dodge, IA
markchingren@yahoo.com
07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Annette Hayes
Carencro, LA
annette.hayes.c9nd@statefarm.com
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Lee Ann Lane
Shreveport, LA
lalanedallastx@yahoo.com
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Chad Hruska
Dubuque, IA
chad.hruska@voya.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

William McIntee
Waterloo, IA
bmcintee@fdg.net
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Christopher McCrady
Fort Dodge, IA
cmccrady@amfam.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Stuart R Romal
Williamsville, NY
prsw98@yahoo.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Sam Winward
Wellsville, UT
sam@winwardfinancial.com

07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Richard Hogan
West Jordan, UT
hoga909@gmail.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

J. Madison Dye, Jr
Columbia, SC
madison.dye@mailsouth.net
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Johnny Crow
Slidell, LA
jccnyl@aol.com

07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jackie Seitz
Butte, MT
jseitz01@ft.newyorklife.com
07/14/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Glenn Thorning
Baton Rouge, LA
glenn.thorning@gmail.com

07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

James Sandefur
natchitoches, LA
jpsand@cp-tel.net
07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

In today's market the employee has many ways of changing their own investment portfolio and many times the advisor has no knowledge of these transactions. Also the interest rate environment is constantly changing which will effect return but because there are surrender penalties in many products what was good for the client may not be the best on the market, but there would be no way to fix the problem making the advisor suddenly responsible for something that he could not foresee or be held responsible for. Using the set of rule in this regulation most agents will just simply stop selling any investments and leave the client to do it by themselves.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.
- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.
- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.
- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Roger Salinas
Edinburg, TX
rlsalinas@ft.newyorklife.com

07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jacob Sparrow
Layton, UT
jake.sparrow@american-national.com
07/14/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Zachary Nielson

Ogden, UT

znielson@sfp.us

07/14/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Larry Askins
Maeshall, MO
laskins@socket.net
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Anthony Manasseri
Nixa, MO
tony.manasseri@thrivent.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Paul Cross
Chesterfield, MO
paul.cross@nm.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

James Fuller
Athens, OH
jfuller@sniderfullerstroh.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I live and work in Athens, Ohio, the poorest county in the state. The majority of my clients are self-employed, blue collar workers at Ohio University, artisans and the underemployed. Should I be required to charge them for the time I spend with them, it would leave the most in need of my advice without the services and education I offer. Many of these individuals and families need the protection that can only be made available through insurance based contracts. A true professional understands the necessity of serving the entire community - not just those with deeper pockets.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Brandon Pederson
Cape Girardeau, MO
brandon.pederson@nm.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Songlin Yang Flushing, NY
yangs@ft.newyorklife.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Joanne Squires
Geneva, NY
squiresj@ft.newyorklife.com

07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Michele Guerin
New Orleans, LA
mguerin@ft.nyl.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Chester Mastalerz
Mason, OH
notimetospare@msn.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jim Ashley
Louisville, KY
jimashley41@gmail.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Mark Hanson
Naperville, IL
mark@hansonfinancial.com

07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Kelli Newman
Lexington, KY
knewmanfss@gmail.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Sherry Henry
Louisville, KY
sherryhenryky@gmail.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Tedra Pine Columbus, OH
tpine@ferris-financial.com

07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jonathan Stone
Huntington, NY
jonathan.stoen@axa-advisors.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Giovanni Treglia
BROOKVILLE, NY
gtreglia84@aol.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Nate Collier Thrivent Financial
Lexington, KY
nathaniel.collier@thrivent.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Adam Solano Grayslake, IL
aa126621@hotmail.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Nicole Holland-Hong Fairview heights, IL, IL nicole.holland@nm.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Sarah Morrow
Henley, MO
smorrow@luebberinginsurance.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Ugen Peden
Ny, NY
ugenpedrn@gmail.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Paul Aledort
Amityville, NY
paledort@cfslongisland.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Mitchell Pearson
Woodbury, NY
mitch@equinoxfinancialpartners.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

David Bowman
Amherst, NY
davidsbowman@gmail.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Joseph C. Eppolito LUTCF
Liverpool, NY
jeppolito@financialguide.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Chad S. Baker
Upper Sandusky, OH
csbaker@ft.newyorklife.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Austin Blujus
Amherst, NY
ablujus@financialguide.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Kevin Drew
Downers Grove, IL
drew.kevin@principal.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

J. Dennis Johnson
Louisville, KY
djohnson@financialpg.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Ralph Barringer
Louisville, KY
ralph.barringer@nm.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

Please review the following :

Recently, I helped Jane decide what to do with her 401(k) account when she terminated employment. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for Jane. I helped Jane decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet Jane's risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds and an annuity. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Jane would instead just cash out her 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if she hadn't had access to my services.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Karen Ashley
Louisville, KY
karenashley39@gmail.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Tamberly Luechtefeld
St Louis, MO
tammy@stlautoquote.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Most Affton residents that I work with would not know what to do with their retirement accounts and many would end up just taking the money when they leave their employment causing them significant tax consequences and certainly not in their best interest regarding funding their future retirement. Our residents need advice from professionals that do have their best interest in mind. With the aging population of our community this is VERY important.

Thanks for your time.

Alfred C. Corina
Mobile, AL
acorina@ft.newyorklife.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Frank S Dunaway, III, CLU
Carthage, MO
fsdunaway@swbell.net
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

John Osborn
Springfield, MO
john@osbornassoc.com

07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Danielle Giordano
Brooklyn, NY
dgiordano526@gmail.com

07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Allan Feldman
East Liverpool, OH
arfeld@comcast.net
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Mary Busby-Simpson
St. Louis, MO
mbusby-simpson@mpcgmidwest.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Rebecca Barahona
Sheldon, IA
rebecca.barahona@fbfs.com

07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Kevin Brown
Albuquerque, NM
kbrown@gfainvestments.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Constance Bessa-Rittler waukesha, WI
cbessa@aol.com

07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. It is my sincere belief that the proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors, including small business owners who care greatly about their employee's ability to save for retirement, need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Under current regulations, investors, small business plan sponsors and retirement plan participants are clearly advised of compensation being paid to financial representatives. Not one of our clients have ever expressed a concern about this. They clearly understand, via every day experience, the nature of the work we perform for them.

In many cases, small employers do not have the luxury of having a dedicated HR department and so the owner wears that hat and must sift through all the rules and regulations applicable when it comes to defined contribution plan set up and administration. Trying to keep on top of that, along with navigating a business through the recent recession, all the while providing JOBS, can be a monstrous task.

Many of these same employers stopped matching 401k deferrals during the recession and are just now getting back to matching, a VERY IMPORTANT event in our world. If you begin making things so complicated and cumbersome that reps have no choice but to bow out of the retirement plan market, how do you expect this to end? Not well is my thought.

We are the unsung heroes of the small employer 401k market. The work it takes to solicit, set up and service a small (under $100,000) or new plan is in no way compensated by the commissions generated in the first 2 to 4 years under current commission standards. It requires a long term commitment on both the part of the plan sponsor and the rep and that requires mutual trust and respect and willingness to work together. This is something, sir, you cannot legislate or issue regulations on. It must come from hard work, intelligence, ethics and character.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. This would add to overhead

cost of the plan. I can say for a fact that if we had to charge for all of the service we provide to small employer plan sponsors the plan would not be viable.

- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. Many employees, particularly in blue collar environments do not recognize the value of saving for retirement. The current administration in Washington originally wanted all retirement plan participation to be mandatory several years ago. Now you want to remove any possibility these people have of getting any kind of valuable information with regard to saving for old age.

- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. Without the possibility of working with retiring and terminated plan participants registered representatives would lose an important avenue of expanding clientele. Just because a rep asks a plan participant for the opportunity to provide rollover options other than Scottrade or Charles Schwab internet accounts does not always mean he is a crook out to fleece an unknowing individual for heaven's sake.

- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

I would be happy to provide further enlightenment on exactly how millions of hard working registered representatives help people with financial decisions every day, many times for NO COMPENSATION because contrary to what the public seems to believe, not everyone who comes to us is in a position to use our services, they just need access to our huge knowledge base.

My mailing address is not my physical address for legislative districting. It is P.O. Box 52, Wales, WI 53183.

K. Mark Spears, CLU, ChFC Lima, OH
mark.spears@prudential.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

My industry has seen a tremendous decline in the number of career oriented individuals who are willing to serve the broad "middle market" by working for relatively low earnings in the early years in order to become established as a trusted and competent advisor. Regulations such as this proposal will drive more competent advisors out of the business and make it even more difficult, probably impossible, for new folks to become established. More importantly, it will have the effect of making the services we now provide to our valued clients far too expensive for them to afford, therefore harming the very people it purports to help.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Bradey Loffert
Morgantown, WV
bradey.loffert@nm.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Pierce Brown
Fairfield, OH
pierce@piercebrowninsurance.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Dominic Vermette
East Waterboro, ME
dominic.vermette@horacemann.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Sweetea Khona
Lake Success, NY
skkhona@ft.newyorklife.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Bruce Beaty
Rohnert Park, CA
beatybruce@hotmail.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

robert frankel plainview, NY
robert.frankel@axa-advisors.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

John Ridoux
Louisville, KY
jfiuridoux@bellsouth.net
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

bruce block
louisville, KY
bruce.block@oasecurities.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

I routinely will spend hours each week with educating common employees to:

1. educate them about retirement savings
2. explain terms and how investing works
3. save them from walking away with a small cash out amount
4. conduct ongoing enrollment and education seminars at small employers sites

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Wendy Morse
East Islip, NY
wendym@conferenceny.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

albert brodbeck
stamford, CT
brodbeckal@gmail.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Larry Vakoutis
Baltimore, MD
larryvakoutis@gmail.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Gregory Mark Kokosko
Annapolis, MD
mkokosko@vwbrown.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Marilee Daugherty Republic, MO
marilee@goclarity.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Rolando Castillo
Croton on Hudson, NY
rolando.castillo@axa-advisors.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Ben Lukens
St. Louis, MO
bml4h5@yahoo.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Robert Tavarez
Elmont, NY
rtavarez@lfnllc.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Prakash Velankar
New Hyde Park, NY
prakash.velankar@axa-advisors.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Paul Stokes
Waunakee, WI
paul.stokes@countryfinancial.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jeff Keicher
Sycamore, IL
jeff.keicher.quhx@statefarm.com

07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Brian Haney
Silver Spring, MD
bhaney@financialguide.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Irv Wiese
Lexington, SC
irvwiese1@gmail.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Wayne McHargue
Fishers, IN
wmchargue@aol.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Christopher Henry
Fenton, MO
chrislouishenry@gmail.com

07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

John E McCadden III
Chesterfield, MO
johnmccadden@nyl.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Craig Wright
Springfield, MO
cwright@sfcinc.net
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Eric Keling
Saint Peters, MO
eric.keling@nm.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Lisa Bussiere
Auburn, ME
lisa.bussiere@horacemann.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Don Bratcher
Bowling Green, KY
don.bratcher@gmail.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Brendan Slavin
seaford, NY
bmslavin@ft.newyorklife.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Tom Goodman
Holland, OH
agoodman623@gmail.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Thomas Lynch
Troy, NY
talynch8081@gmail.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Wayne Peck
Findlay, OH
wpeck@investmentstuff.com

07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Christopher Shum
Iselin, NJ
chrisshum@aol.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Mark Legaspi
Miller Place, NY
mark@legaspiassociates.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Todd Clark
Fargo, ND
todd.clark@countryfinancial.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Recently, I helped Christy decide what to do with her investments that she needed help with as a result of the company's pension plan desolving. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for Christy. I helped Christy decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet her risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of plan. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Christy would instead just cash out her 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if she hadn't had access to my services OR some other option that may or may not have been of benefit to her.

Samuel Yakubu
New Rochelle, NY
samuel@skybrokerage.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Timothy Coutu
Holtsville, NY
tcoutu@ft.newyorklife.com

07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Leslie Peck
Springfield, MO
lpeck@pecksinsuranceandfinancial.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Alex Rosenblatt
San Francisco, CA
alex.rosenblatt@nm.com

07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Scott Buckman
Springfield, MO
buckmansoffice@gmail.com

07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

John Halstenson
Grand Forks, ND
john.halstenson@thrivent.com

07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

My clients need the this kind of advice on how to turn their retirement savings into a useable income that will last as long as they need it. Please keep that in mind.

Anthony Ladas
Palos Park, IL
aladas@mpsloria.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

George Formes
Aquebogue, NY
george.formes@farm-family.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

michael kaplan huntington station, NY
mike@michaelskaplan.com

07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal on the DOL FIDUCIARY RULE is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

ELENA TREGLIA
Glen Head, NY
elena@tregliacpa.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

jay p miller
boynton beach, FL
jaypmiller@ft.newyorklife.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Bill Edgar Elburn, IL
edgar.bill@principal.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Kenneth Head
Greenville, SC
ken@headfinancial.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Bruno Albarello
Elmhurst, IL
albarello.bruno@principal.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

William Moriarity
Louisville, KY
william.moriarity@kofc.org
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Recently, I helped a Client decide what to do with his 401(k) account when he terminated employment. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice. I helped him decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet his risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of an annuity. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that he would instead just cash out his 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if he hadn't had access to my services.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Lav Varma
Parlin, NJ
lav.varma@axa-advisors.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Tim Kammer
Lakewood, NY
tim.kammer.bt37@statefarm.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

LUKE WIMSATT
FARMINGTON, NM
lwimsatt87@gmail.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Robert Davis
Hanover, MD
rdavis3@metlife.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

Recently, I helped a client decide what to do with her 401(k) account when she terminated employment. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice. I helped her decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet Jane's risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds and an annuity. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that she would instead just cash out her 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if she hadn't had access to my services.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Laura Barron
Columbia, SC
labarronsc@aol.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Lawrence Tantilla
Downers Grove, IL
tantilla.larry@principal.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Amy S. Arnett LUTCF
Crestwood, KY
amy@ameritasbrokerage.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Charlie Bright
Saint Louis, MO
charliebright@gmail.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Salvatore Culoso
Woodbury, NY
salvatore.culoso@axa-advisors.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Stanislav Zelivianski
Chicago, IL
zelivianski.stan@principal.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

TMORA PAYNE
PONTOTOC, MS
tmorapayne@yahoo.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Michael P Brutton
Saint Louis, MO
mpbrutton@ft.newyorklife.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jennifer Marquardt
Lockport, IL
jennifer@dyjakassociates.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Trent Beckwith
Mechanicville, NY
trent.beckwith@nm.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Greg Grimes
Columbia, MO
ggrimes@cfiemail.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Stephen Yi
Schaumburg, IL
syi01@ft.newyorklife.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Michael G. Reynolds LUTCF
Ashland, OH
mgreynolds@farleypeeples.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I am a member of NAIFA, the National Association of Insurance and Financial Advisors, a professional ethics based organization for professionals in the industry. I choose to be a member of this organization specifically because it is ethics based. I believe whole-heartedly in the Golden Rule, and strive to always do what is in my clients' best interests, regardless of the situation. That said, there are many instances where the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors (the largest part of my particular business).

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for 7 years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients. They work with me specifically because they want education regarding their choices, and, perhaps, a recommendation or two to help them decide.

The proposal is harmful to middle-income and low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

I think that this entire topic fiduciary reform is caused by bureaucrats creating a problem where one does not really exist. The industry has become so over-regulated that the fine print on applications of any financial product (implemented as part of a strategy) spans pages and pages that clients rarely take the time to read; therefore what is intended to protect them actually harms them.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Samuel Hoskins
Jefferson City, MO
samuelhoskins94@gmail.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Stephanie Meissner
Clayton, MO
stephanie.meissner@nm.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jac DerKacy
Orland Park, IL
jderkacy@ft.newyorklife.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Harsimranjeet Sandhu
South Richmond Hill, NY
sandhu.simran1@hotmail.com

07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Michael Caron Elbridge, NY
caron.mike@principal.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Wesley Febus
Grand Rapids, MI
wesfebus@aol.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure. I have been providing that since 1969.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Julianna Czechorski
Chesterfield, MO
j.czechorski@nm.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Dennis Gaffney Gaffney
Selden, NY
dgaffney@ft.newyorklife.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Barrett Essman
Rock Island, IL
barrett.essman@modern-woodmen.org
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is completely unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients. Our entire industry is being stereotyped the DOL and the President as being corrupt and that all financial advisors are crooks, which is not the case. Millions of Americans receive competent and professional advice tailored to their own investment strategies each and every day.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

I strongly encourage you to play an active part in trying to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Enacting this regulation will not only have a devastating effect on the Financial Services industry, but that of Tourism, Airline and Hospitality to name a few. Call centers for financial services firms will shut down. Financial Advisors who are unable to adhere to these strict regulations will lose their jobs. Sales trips will no longer exist, which means that Financial Advisors who work hard doing what is right for every American is no longer awarded for their hard work. Cities will lose out in tourism from these companies that hosted sales trips for their hard working Financial Advisors. Less people will be flying, staying in hotels and eating out at restaurants. Do You want to be a part of a regulation that will put cause Americans to lose their jobs especially during a reelection year?

Joseph Fimmano
Valley Cottage, NY
jjfimmano@ft.newyorklife.com

07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Harish chugh
n h p, NY
harishchugh@hotmail.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Robert Wolken
St Louis, MO
robb.wolken@nm.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jonathan Eickhorst
New Bloomfield, MO
jeickhorst73@gmail.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Sebastian Mazzotta
EAST MEADOW, NY
sebastianmazzotta49@gmail.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Daniel Liebers
northbrook, IL
danliebers@yahoo.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Amanda Scicchitano
Bethpage, NY
amscicc@comcast.net
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Thomas Michel
Los Angeles, CA
tmichel@michelfinancial.com

07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

I work with primarily middle America and then this proposal will greatly interfere with my ability to work with them. Just today I helped someone with $40,000 rollover, no other institution would help her as frankly it was not profitable or "worth their time." At NAIFA these are our core customers.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Diana Luebbering
New Bloomfield, MO
dmluebbering@luebberinginsurance.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Kathy Strickland
Overland Park, KS
kstrickland@ft.newyorklife.com

07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

William Dunstan
Poughkeepsie, NY
wdunstan1@yahoo.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

I am constantly educating my clients on multiple aspects of investing their retirement monies. After they retire I again educate them on the risks, costs, asset allocation as well as income tax consequences of utilizing retirement monies, which are overwhelming for many clients. The current proposed changes would not allow me to be compensated for this ongoing assistance.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Alan Ziegler
Fairport, NY
aziegler@ffcorp.net
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

James Altebrando
PortJefferson, NY
james.altebrando@axa-advisor.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Shawn Ellingson
Hawley, MN
shawn.ellingson@american-national.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Donald .Polay
port washington, NY
donald.polay@axa-advisors.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jacob Elrod
Harrod, OH
jacob.elrod@prudential.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is not workable for my clients that live on main street not wall street. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many of my clients and retirement savers without access to the professional education, advice and services that I provide.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Rick Henderson
Columbia, MO
henderson@apex-fin.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Michael Thoreson Spirit Lake, IA
michael.thoreson@fbfs.com
07/15/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Dennis Luebbering
New Bloomfield, MO
dluebbering@luebberingfinancial.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Thomas Antinora
Rochester, NY
antinot1@nationwide.com
07/15/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Brooks Luebbering
Jefferson City, MO
bluebbering@luebberinginsurance.com
07/15/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Terri Huber
Albuquerque, NM
thuber@tognm.com
07/16/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Stewart Durrell
Wilton, ME
stewart.durrell@horacemann.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

wrensey james winchester, KY
arlonjames@email.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Margo Smith
Monmouth, ME
margo.smith@horacemann.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Brad Lineberry
Kansas City, MO
bradlineberry@allstate.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Thomas Lynch
Newburgh, NY
tflynch26@gmail.com
07/16/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

M Beth Thacker
Poplar Grove, IL
mbeth.thacker@nm.com

07/16/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Krista Kecskemety
Lyndhurst, OH
bill.insurance@gmail.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Cody Weaver
Kansas City, MO
ceweaver33@yahoo.com
07/16/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Lisa Blair
Brimfield, MA
lisablair@financialguide.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

John Eickholt
Council Bluffs, IA
john.eickholt@american-national.com
07/16/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

William Stanik
Arnold, MD
stanik609@gmail.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jennifer Ellis
Springfield, VA
jcorcoran@naifa.org
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I am concerned that the DOL Fiduciary rule as currently written would have an adverse impact on the investment education I currently receive and limit the advice on plan withdrawals or rollovers if I changed jobs. Under the proposed rule, advisors' discussion with clients would be limited to generic explanations of products unless their clients agree to pay a costly fee, or sign a Best Interest Contract. The DOL needs to broaden the education exemption.

Many consumers need help rolling over their 401k or other retirement plan to another one that's right for them. This could change under the DOL rule because advisors who work under commission would have to charge a costly fee for the same service. And when I'm ready to retire - I would have to figure out the plan's complicated withdrawal options all on my own. The DOL should clarify the language of the Best Interest Contract so it includes advice on distribution and rollovers.

Casey West
Saint Peter, MN
caseywest@gmail.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Rick Rice
St Louis Park, MN
rick.naifa@gmail.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Rhonda Schwartz
Woodbury, NY
rhonda.schwartz@axa-advisors.com
07/16/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Joshua Beck
Elk River, MN
j1beck@live.com

07/16/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Last fall I helped a small business owner implement a 401k plan to help his business provided a greater retirement benefit to his employees. Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement. Had this been the case the employer may not have started the 401k or the employer contribution to the employees accounts would be much less due to the increased costs.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

If this is really about the consumer than it would be more beneficial to lessen the restrictions on providing advice as it relates to a 401k. So many of my clients are uncertain as to how to invest their 401ks and by law I can only help them narrow the list of options to a small number. Then it is back on the consumer. Most consumers desire additional assistance, which the law currently does not allow for. This current proposed rule would only make it more difficult for consumers to make informed investment decisions inside their employer sponsored retirement plans.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

I am an advisor who currently is able to operate under the suitability standard and the fiduciary standard. As a CFP I am bound by the board of standards to always look out for my clients' best interest. In the past few years I have made sure to share this information with clients. I also give clients the opportunity to work with me in the relationship structure that fits them best (suitability/commission based or RIA/fiduciary). The majority are very satisfied paying a commission. In fact the majority of my clients have a household income that ranges from $50,000-$150,000 and if they were to be required to pay a fee they would very likely reject my services. I fear that if this proposed rule were to take affect, only the upper class would have access to advisors going forward. The costs that the middle class would incur to work with us would no longer be affordable. Many of these middle class people that I work with have very little cash reserves available. They likely would be left on their own for investment and retirement decisions if commissions are banned. Therefore the retirement crisis that is often talked about only gets worse with no one available to provide advice to the middle class. Please don't cut the middle class out from receiving advice from trusted advisors like myself.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Gregory Goeders
Inver Grove Heights, MN
ggoeders@htk.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

mike shimpock nash,texas, TX
mshim4830@aol.com
07/16/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

William Avril
Norton, MA
wavril@financialgroup.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Lee Bluske
La Crosse, WI
leebluske@hotmail.com
07/16/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Daniel Mccarthy
Needham, MA
dmccarthy@pensionc.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Angela Ford
Overland Park, KS
angie@compassfr.us
07/16/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

mark van den branden
rochester hills, MI
mark@advancedinsurance.net
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Aprilyn Chavez geissler
Alb, NM
ageissler@farmersagent.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jane LaMere
Sun Prairie, WI
jlamere@amfamc.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

TAMMI WEINFELD
NEW CITY, NY
tbwinsure@aol.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Nicholas calvaneso
Bloomfield hills, MI
nick@mandomarketing.com

07/16/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Mark Wira
Northville, MI
mwira@ymail.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Janet Slade
gardiner, ME
janet.slade.cyvi@statefarm.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

scott kehoe
Falmouth, ME
skehoe@maine.rr.com
07/16/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Gail Kennedy
Livonia, MI
gkennedy@metlife.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Adejoke Akinjide southgate, MI
adeakinjideagencyinc@gmail.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jerome Baron
New York, NY
jerry.baron@gmail.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Magenta Ishak
Silver Spring, MD
mishak@naifa.org
07/16/2015

Re: Department of Labor's Proposed "Fiduciary" Rule

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm concerned about the DOL's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal of helping more Americans save more for retirement, the rule as currently written would have an adverse impact on the investment counseling I currently receive and limit the advice on plan withdrawals or rollovers if I changed jobs. Under the proposed rule, I would only receive generic explanations of products unless I agree to pay a fee or sign a Best Interest Contract.

Many people need help rolling over their 401k plans. This could change under the rule because some of us can't afford to pay a "management fee" to get advice. And when I'm ready to retire - I would have to figure out the plan's complicated withdrawal options all on my own. The DOL should clarify the language of the BIC so that it includes advice on distributions and rollovers and broadens the education exemption.

Thank you for considering my views on this matter.

Judy Ringler Mountain
Mankato, MN
jrmountain@ft.newyorklife.com
07/16/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

wayne perkins
oxford, MS
wayne.perkins@sfbic.com
07/16/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Thomas Maloney
Boston, MA
tmaloney@financialguide.com
07/16/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Patrick Brown
Saint Paul, MN
pbrown@capstoneadvgroup.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Miguel Alvarez
Overland Park, KS
miguel.alvarez.ghuo@statefarm.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Tyler Hirth
minnetonka, MN
hirth.tyler@gmail.com
07/16/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Timothy Dwyer
Milwaukee, WI
tim@gfgwisconsin.com
07/16/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Mary Jane Hosmer
Amherst, NY
mhosmer@financialguide.com
07/16/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Mark Johnson
Clarence, NY
mark.e.johnson@thrivent.com
07/16/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Kendra Kamstra
Sheldon, IA
kendra.kamstra@fbfs.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Mark Karcher
Bloomfield, MI
mak.karcher@gmail.com
07/16/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Gregory Goeders
Inver Grove Heights, MN
ggoeders@htk.com
07/16/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Dan Ghirsig
clarence, NY
dan.ghirsig@thrivent.com
07/16/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Daniel Klain York Haven, PA
dfk1231964@gmail.com
07/16/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Robert Chappell
Biddeford Pool, ME
rchappell@maine.rr.com
07/16/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Charles Shufeldt
Arnold, MO
charles.shufeldt@gmail.com
07/16/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

William Warren
West Des Moines, IA
bill.warren@centralfinancialgroup.com
07/16/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Brian Keane
Manchester, NH
bkeane@ft.newyorklife.com
07/16/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

John Naastad
Bemidji, MN
john.naastad@countryfinancial.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Stephen Schocke
Rochester Hills, MI
stephen.schocke@thrivent.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Patrick Gores
Fargo, ND
gores@cableone.net
07/16/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Colin Robertson
Annapolis, MD
colinrobertson@financialguide.com
07/16/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jodi Mathwig
Savage, MN
jodi.mathwig@gmail.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.
- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Shirley Krenik
Elysian, MN
skrenik@frontiernet.net
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Thomas Cramer
Houston, TX
tmcramer1@mac.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Tony Turner
Jackson, KY
parkmantony@yahoo.com
07/16/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Neil Van Dam
west fargo, ND
neil.vandam@nm.com

07/16/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Edwin (Duke) Marston Belfast, ME
dukeclu@roadrunner.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

MINA FERNANDEZ
LAKE SUCCESS, NY
mgfernande01@ft.newyorklife.com
07/16/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Christine Proulx
Kingfield, ME
proulx-ins@roadrunner.com
07/16/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients. The marketplace weeds out the bad apples, most of us do great good for our clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

H Larry Fortenberry, CPA, CLU, ChFC

Jackson, MS

larry@epgbenefits.com

07/16/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Mark Gugel
Shelby Township, MI
mark.gugel@thrivent.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

William Wagner
Orchard Park, NY
william.wagner@ceteranetworks.com
07/16/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Mary Penn
Casselberry, FL
mpenn34@cfl.rr.com
07/16/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jay Warren
West Des Moines, IA
warren.jayk@gmail.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Joseph Koehler
Superior, WI
jk@koehlerinsurancesolutions.com
07/16/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jill Mostek
St Clair Shores, MI
jill@mostekagency.com
07/16/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Martin Pavlick CLU, ChFC
Rochester Hills, MI
marty.pavlick@nm.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Brandon Kohnen
Creve Coeur, MO
bmkohnen@ft.newyorklife.com

07/16/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Joseph Koehler
Superior, WI
jk@koehlerinsurancesolutions.com
07/16/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jesse Fox
Urich, MO
jfox45@icloud.com
07/16/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Leonard Romano
Norridge, IL
lenenzng@msn.com
07/16/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my advisor putting clients first. My Advisor whom I've know for a number of years has my best interests in mind. Otherwise, I would no longer be his client.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits my advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Sean Smith
Des Peres, MO
sean.smith@nm.com
07/16/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

John Carlson
Bemidji, MN
jcarlo3@amfam.com
07/16/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Brian Fleming
Alexandria, MN
bfleming@focusfinancial.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Timothy Lucas
Bemidji, MN
tim.lucas@insureforward.com
07/16/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

David Krough
Kansas City, MO
david.krough.d3ym@statefarm.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kathleen Todd
Pequot, MN
egglady@tds.net

07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jeanmarie Kricher
New York, NY
jkplanning@yahoo.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Greg Mortenson
Eden Prairie, MN
gmortenson@capstoneadvgroup.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Thomas Rausch
Fond du Lac, WI
tomr@rauschins.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Linette Hartman
Fargo, ND
srhartman@aol.com
07/16/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

James Young
Camillus, NY
jyoung5348@hotmail.com
07/16/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Earl Prolman
Nashua, NH
eprolman@ft.newyorklife.com
07/17/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

David Covato
Clymer, PA
davecovato@allstate.com
07/17/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Ellen Robertson
Annapolis, MD
ellenrobertson.ellen@gmail.com
07/17/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Stephen Ross
Boston, MA
sross@financialguide.com
07/17/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

William Free, Jr
Fairfax, VA
william.free@nm.com
07/17/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Brian Stone
Cumberland, ME
brstone@maine.rr.com
07/17/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Julie Phillips
Moorhead, MN
juliephillips1520@gmail.com
07/17/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I am concerned that the DOL Fiduciary rule as currently written would have an adverse impact on the investment education I currently receive and limit the advice on plan withdrawals or rollovers if I retire or change jobs. Under the proposed rule, advisors' discussion with clients would be limited to generic explanations of products unless their clients agree to pay a costly fee, or sign a Best Interest Contract. The DOL needs to broaden the education exemption.

Many consumers need help rolling over their 401k or other retirement plan to another one that's right for them. This could change under the DOL rule because advisors who work under commission would have to charge a costly fee for the same service. And when I'm ready to retire - I would have to figure out the plan's complicated withdrawal options all on my own. The DOL should clarify the language of the Best Interest Contract so it includes advice on distribution and rollovers.

Thank you for your time and consideration.

Marjorie Wiechert
Lincoln, NE
marge@naifa-cornhusker.org
07/17/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I am concerned that the DOL Fiduciary rule as currently written would have an adverse impact on the investment education I currently receive and limit the advice on plan withdrawals or rollovers if I retire or change jobs. Under the proposed rule, advisors' discussion with clients would be limited to generic explanations of products unless their clients agree to pay a costly fee, or sign a Best Interest Contract. The DOL needs to broaden the education exemption.

Many consumers need help rolling over their 401k or other retirement plan to another one that's right for them. This could change under the DOL rule because advisors who work under commission would have to charge a costly fee for the same service. And when I'm ready to retire - I would have to figure out the plan's complicated withdrawal options all on my own. The DOL should clarify the language of the Best Interest Contract so it includes advice on distribution and rollovers.

Julie Spinler
Dexter, MN
julie.spinler@fbfs.com
07/17/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Kevin Mattina
Diberville, MS
kevin@mattinainsurance.com

07/17/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Frances Griffing
So. Portland, ME
fgriffing@ft.newyorklife.com
07/17/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Matthew Pomerantz
New York, NY
matthew@millerpomerantz.com

07/17/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jeremy Ripperger
Glyndon, MN
jeremy.ripperger@nm.com
07/17/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting clients first. As a supervisor, my job is to make sure that the clients' best interests are put first, and that my reps are following the rules and regulations that govern our industry.

What I have found in my almost 10 years in the industry is that the vast majority of reps want to do the best by their clients, and abhor the examples of those that violate the public's trust. My reps want to see those that violate get what they deserve, but do not want to be thrown into the mix with them by having new regulations that harm their businesses. By creating this new rule, you are punishing the reps who are doing their best, and harming the public by changing a system that works very well the vast majority of the time. We should not punish everyone for the mistakes of a few. This is going to cause very dire unintended consequences.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Michael Macieira
Watchung, NJ
mmacieiraa@msn.com
07/17/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ben Aranda
Glendale, CA
barandalutcf@yahoo.com
07/17/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Michael Geary
La Jolla, CA
geary.michael@pennmutual.com
07/17/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jeremiah Talton
Gulfport, MS
jeremiah_talton@us.aflac.com
07/17/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Dan Pumper lonsdale, MN
dpumper@fbfs.com
07/17/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Frank Ball
Saint Albans, WV
frankball61@yahoo.com
07/17/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Ethan Poole
Saint Albans,, WV
ethan.poole@horacemann.com
07/17/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Helen Kho
New York, NY
hokho@ft.newyorklife.com
07/17/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Shannon Kuetemeyer Robertson CAE
Baton Rouge, LA
shannonkrobertson@outlook.com

07/17/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

I am concerned that the DOL Fiduciary rule as currently written would have an adverse impact on the investment education I currently receive and limit the advice on plan withdrawals or rollovers if I retire or change jobs. Under the proposed rule, advisors' discussion with clients would be limited to generic explanations of products unless their clients agree to pay a costly fee, or sign a Best Interest Contract. The DOL needs to broaden the education exemption.

Many consumers need help rolling over their 401k or other retirement plan to another one that's right for them. This could change under the DOL rule because advisors who work under commission would have to charge a costly fee for the same service. And when I'm ready to retire - I would have to figure out the plan's complicated withdrawal options all on my own. The DOL should clarify the language of the Best Interest Contract so it includes advice on distribution and rollovers.

Debby EVans
Lawrenceville, GA
evansdp@bellsouth.net
07/17/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kai Stanton
Syosset, NY
kstanton@financialguide.com
07/17/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jan Hartman
Harrisburg, PA
jhartman@naifa-pa.org
07/17/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I am concerned that the DOL Fiduciary rule as currently written would have an adverse impact on the investment education I currently receive and limit the advice on plan withdrawals or rollovers if I retire or change jobs. Under the proposed rule, advisors' discussion with clients would be limited to generic explanations of products unless their clients agree to pay a costly fee, or sign a Best Interest Contract. The DOL needs to broaden the education exemption.

Many consumers need help rolling over their 401k or other retirement plan to another one that's right for them. This could change under the DOL rule because advisors who work under commission would have to charge a costly fee for the same service. And when I'm ready to retire - I would have to figure out the plan's complicated withdrawal options all on my own. The DOL should clarify the language of the Best Interest Contract so it includes advice on distribution and rollovers.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Karl Hansen
LOS ALTOS, CA
karl@vitamail.com
07/17/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kim Kieschnick
Austin, TX
kimkieschnick@gmail.com
07/17/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Douglas Hallett
Blue Ash, OH
dhallett@parklandrep.com
07/17/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

John Harvell
Houlton, ME
john@insurethecounty.com

07/17/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Bernie Schnurbusch
Perryville, MO
bernard.schnurbusch@prudential.com
07/17/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Scott Hotop
Perryville, MO
sjhotop@gmail.com
07/17/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Mark Snider
Athens, OH
mark@sniderfullerstroh.com
07/18/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Michael Moen
Bemidji, MN
michael.moen@nm.com

07/18/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

I believe this proposed regulation to be an example of good intentions which will actually create the opposite results intended.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

John Barada
Saint Louis, MO
jbarada@hfgstl.com
07/18/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Joel North
Urbandale, IA
north.joel@principal.com
07/19/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jared Boot
Oak Park, IL
jaredboot@live.com
07/19/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Steven Ruttgeizer
Jericho, NY
sruttgeizer@lfnllc.com
07/19/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Frank Wilcoxwf Fisers, IN
wfsincfw@msn.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

For all practical purposes, this rule will effectively destroy a financial services industry which has served people of this country far better than any services has in any other country in the world. Our people enjoy more quality of life retirements and financial stability than any other county's population.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure. Without the services offered by current system, most Americans will make no choices or poor choices as to how to preserve what they have worked all their lives to accumulate.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Tom Kasprzak
Portland, ME
kasprzak_thomas@nlv.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Bill Pyott
Lake Forest, CA
wfpott@ft.nyl.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

William Wagner
Orchard Park, NY
william.wagner@ceteranetworks.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Rick Johnston
Chickasha, OK
rick.johnston.nqw8@statefarm.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Walter Grant
Memphis, TN
wgrant@financialguide.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

I am a professional who focuses exclusively on retirement plan services. The rule changes will severely restrict my ability to tailor solutions to my clients needs. In consultation with my clients I propose solutions based on their current financial situations, risk tolerance, tax status and objectives, utilizing a wide variety of financial vehicles and instruments. Removing that flexibility will limit my ability to help clients, some of whom I have had relationships with for more than a decade, and possibly cause them to suffer adverse consequences because of the narrow-path solutions that will be imposed on the financial services industry.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Mike Latta
Fort Worth, TX
mlatta@intrusco.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Beverly Barr
Lebanon, PA
bev barr@barrassociatesinc.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I have a major concern regarding DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32). Because I do a financial analysis with most clients which includes a risk tolerance, liquidity needs family goals, future income needs, etc., and I receive commissions from the purchase of mutual funds and/or annuities, under the current proposed rule, I would be prohibited from guiding clients as to what is in their best interest which could result in them making major uninformed decisions regarding their future financial picture. American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.
- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.
- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.
- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Carl Camillo
Parma, OH
carlc@plancorp.biz
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule effectively prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement. Believe it or not, commissions for small or start up plans are often lower than level fees.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Without affordable professional guidance, the start-up 401(k), SIMPLE and/or SEP markets may simply collapse.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. I am sure we can all agree that receiving advice and paying a commission is far better than receiving no advice and not saving.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated. Could you imagine a physician not being able to ask questions prior to making a diagnosis?

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. It is a rare retiree (or former employee) who would rather deal with their former HR department than with a trained professional when making decisions in regards to what is likely to be some of their largest invested assets.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. Realistically, the BIC exemption is completely unworkable and may as well be a prohibition. I believe a number of professional organizations have expressed this view.

If, when making a rollover, the retiree has a "buy and hold" mentality, it may be less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee. In fact, the SEC is making "reverse churning" a target enforcement area. (That is, fee-based accounts with little activity). So the SEC and DOL are sending conflicting messages to advisors.

The DOL should clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions and 12b-1 fees without using the aforementioned unworkable BIC exemption.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL should provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL should simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

I am a member of several professional organizations, including the National Association of Insurance and Financial Advisors, the National Association of Plan Advisors and the Financial Planning Association (to name a few). I know that the FPA has shown support for this proposal while NAIFA and NAPA have opposed it. I strongly support the NAIFA and NAPA position and feel the FPA is mistaken. This proposal, as drafted, would be detrimental to small and start-up plans as well as hard working Americans who are contributing regularly to their IRAs or have relatively small balances.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

John Jaeger
West Des Moines, IA
john.jaeger@centralfinancialgroup.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Michael Burnette
Knoxville, TN
mburnette@wmgfinancialadvisors.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for 20 years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

I have been teaching retirement classes at the local community colleges for 18 years. Those that attend the classes are seeking knowledge about retirement and investing that they are not getting elsewhere. Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Barbara Allison-Stadefer CSA Chattanooga, TN
bastande@aol.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

I am a Certified Senior Advisor and have many come to me when looking at retirement because it is so confusing for them to know what to do with their 401k's and retirement they have saved. I have just completed a transfer from a 401k to a fixed indexed annuity for Paulette who is single and needs to know what she has to depend on as far as an income for the rest of her life. She was thrilled with knowing she can not lose money in this vehicle, but can grow it safely and she also knows the bottom line on what she can depend on. She left my office relieved. I helped another single woman who is retiring from school teaching move her retirement to a fixed annuity with a lifetime income. While I don't delve into the stock market or variable annuities, this law would also affect me and my clients in a very negative way. They depend on me to help them.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Stan Henderer
Pendleton, OR
stanhman@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services. It does more harm than good.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Gerald Behnkendorf
Algona, IA
jerry.behnkendorf@centralfinancialgroup.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Richard Cordaro
West Des Moines, IA
cordaro.rick@principal.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Allan E. Harpold III
pottstown, PA
aharpoldiii@ft.newyorklife.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Chad Akselrad
Bala Cynwyd, PA
cakselrad@ft.nyl.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Ronald Housley
Maplewood, NJ
housley_ronald@nlvmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

David Boynton
Irvine, CA
dboynton@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

clarke langrall jr
towson, MD
clarke@forecastadvisors.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Timothy Haas
Sandy Hook, CT
tim.haas@live.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Richard Rainforth
West Des Moines, IA
rrain4th@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Mark Hansen
Sacramento, CA
mark@hansenfg.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

James Sharpe
Apex, NC
jvsharpe@yahoo.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Shann Conner
Fresno, CA
shann@connerinsuranceservices.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Gina Mills
Robinson, IL
gina.mills@countryfinancial.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Peter Freska
San Juan Capistrano, CA
peter@lblgroup.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Ernest Braunwalder
Alta Loma, CA
ernie@ebinsurance.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

I am in the insurance business for 35 years and I obtained my Securities License in 1999 to completely serve my clients needs for financial security. My clients trust me in both their insurance, retirement and college savings planning needs. I consistently educate myself on all aspects of my business to provide the best solutions for my clients. This proposal would change my relationship with my clients and impact their access to affordable sound advise.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Marsha Slater
Barboursville, WV
marsha.slater.bwb6@statefarm.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Marcelo Perez
katy, TX
mperez0355@yahoo.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Dan Tuchmann
Jacksonville, FL
insuremedan@healthinsurancethomas.com

07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Mitchell Starr
PLANTATION, FL
mitchstarr@blsfinancial.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Chris Taggart
cody, WY
ctaggart@taggartcompany.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Tim Shoopman
Denton, TX
tim@timshoopman.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jeremy Leibowitz
Woodland Hills, CA
jeremy.leibowitz@axa-advisors.com

07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for years, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Steve Welch
Saint Petersburg, FL
steve.welch.uq5j@statefarm.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Corey North
Washington, IL
corey@coreynorth.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Rachel Schilling
Metairie, LA
lilrae06@cox.net

07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

William Rock
Bossier City, LA
wrock@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Stephen Wigley
Maryville, TN
stephen.a.wigley@mwarep.org
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I am a single person operating from an office in my home community and only keep my clients best interest at heart when helping them! I will be put out of business and be collateral damage in a unfair and unjust ruling!

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

kent thiessen broken arrow, OK
kthiessen1@cox.net
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Frank E Carlini Jr CLU ChFCf
Pittsburgh, PA
fecswc@aol.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

As a professional who has worked with individuals and families for over thirty years in helping them plan for their financial future, using insurance and investment products,

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Larry R. Ynman
San Antonio, TX
larry.ynman@sogowrm.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Don Lee Canyon, TX
don.lee@voyafa.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Robert Lyons
Amarillo, TX
robert.lyons@voya.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Patrick Stokes
Tyler, TX
patrick.stokes@horacemann.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Ann Ronn
Houston, TX
ann@incomeprotectioninc.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

So many clients need "free" advice that we help them with on an ongoing basis and we receive no compensation, just as an advisor does daily to be of service to our clients.

This new legislation would keep us from being a resource, in particular to clients with small portfolios.

Our nation is horrible at saving and investing - they need our help TODAY more than ever.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

James Mitchell
Albuquerque, NM
james.mitchell1019@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jay Moyer
San Antonio, TX
jaymoyer99@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

CLIENTS LOOK TO FINANCIAL PROFESSIONALS FOR ADVICE. THIS RULE WOULD PROHIBIT US FROM PROVIDING THAT ADVICE TO CLIENTS.

Monica Balderrama
Horizon City, TX
mbalderrama@allstate.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Zenobia Harris
Garfield, NJ
zhspru@verizon.net
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Dennis Jones
Tabor City, NC
dennis@acagtc.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Larry L. Taylor
Abilene, TX
lltaylor@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

For thirty-two years I've been helping clients plan for a successful retirement. I've spent many hours and much money obtaining professional designations such as the Chartered Financial Consultant designation so that I can be better prepared to help my clients properly allocate their investment assets in a manner that is properly suited to their needs and goals. I am paid fair commission for my time, advice and for on-going service. A question I always ask myself when advising people is whether what I am recommending to them will hurt them or help them. If it is not in their best interest I do not recommend it to them. People need help to know what to do, but in order to give sound advice and quality service I have to be compensated just like any other business that provides a valuable service.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Frank Walker
cooper city, FL
fwstfarm@mac.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Tonya Turner
Miami, FL
tonya@tonyabakerturner.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Daniel Finkel
Toledo, OH
finkeldp@savageandassociates.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Matt Sipowski sea ranch lakes, FL
sipowski@yahoo.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Edmond Rousee
Montpelier, VT
erousse@nationallife.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Monica Lopez
Austin, TX
monica.lopez@naifa-texas.org
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Leonard Wolff
Houston, TX
leonard@protech-ins.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

James Clark
Richardson, TX
james.clark@nm.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Todd Ringoen
Minot, ND
ringoenfinancial@srt.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Grace Swaby-Smith
Plantation, FL
grace.swaby-smith.mj84@statefarm.com

07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Last week, I helped my client Joseph to decide what to do with his 401(k) account when he was terminated by his employer. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for him. I helped Joseph decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet Joseph's risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives and liquidity needs. I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Joseph would instead just cash out his 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if he hadn't had access to my services. Joseph is one of many clients who I was able to assist during this transition when they had no one else to turn to. If this unworkable rule stands this would leave my client and many others like him with no other viable alternatives. Your assistance in this matter is greatly appreciated.

Guy W. Jones, CFP, RICP
Denton, TX
guy@guylynnfinancial.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Larry D Newman CLU-ChFC

Lexington, KY

Inewman@calton.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

All of these complicated restrictions are putting so much cost and effort in time , money and risk that the less wealthy will never have access to good advice. Government is making giving advice too expensive and too risky for good honest advisors to be able to take time to talk with the very people who need the most help.

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Tim Wilcox
Voorhees, NJ
tim.wilcox@nm.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

John Fisher
Belleair Bluffs, FL
john.fisher@allstate.com

07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

PAMELA SMITH GERMANTOWN, TN
smithfinanciale@bellsouth.net
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Martin Trail
Moscow, ID
martin.trail@nm.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Kay Harless
DeWitt, MI
naifamichigan@yahoo.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I am concerned that the DOL Fiduciary rule as currently written would have an adverse impact on the investment education I currently receive and limit the advice on plan withdrawals or rollovers if I retire or change jobs. Under the proposed rule, advisors' discussion with clients would be limited to generic explanations of products unless their clients agree to pay a costly fee, or sign a Best Interest Contract. The DOL needs to broaden the education exemption.

Many consumers need help rolling over their 401k or other retirement plan to another one that's right for them. This could change under the DOL rule because advisors who work under commission would have to charge a costly fee for the same service. And when I'm ready to retire - I would have to figure out the plan's complicated withdrawal options all on my own. The DOL should clarify the language of the Best Interest Contract so it includes advice on distribution and rollovers.

Kelly Demmo chuluota, FL
kelly.demmo@gmail.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Richard Schweninger
Wichita, KS
schweninger.richard@princor.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

William Ansel
Summerville, SC
william.ansel@prudential.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Scott D. Chandler CLU
Rockledge, FL
sdchandler@ft.newyorklife.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Paul Walker
Tucson, AZ
pwalker1@metlife.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Christie Bonczek
Houston, TX
christiebonczek@yahoo.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Peter Haas
Hebron, CT
peter@haasagency.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Drew Shumski
Lansdale, PA
dshumski@nwam.net
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Annelise Blackall
Hingham, MA
ablackall@dmi.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Mike DiFrancesco
Romansville, PA
msdifran@yahoo.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Pedram Kaivani
Houston, TX
pkaivani@ft.newyorklife.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Ron Snider
Las Vegas, NV
rsnider@optomis.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Anthony Wielt
Mt. Vernon, IL
tony@tonywielt.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

I am a multi-line insurance agent that also handles financial services for my clients. Most of the conversations that I have been involved in regarding retirement planning is explaining the options available to them and going over the consequences of taking the distribution from the plan directly. The % would be very high for the number of people that would do that very thing if they didn't have someone explain the consequences and other options. With the regulations of this proposed change that would prohibit me from having these conversations and countless of uneducated people will make bad and uninformed decisions as a result.

I suspect your intent was not to make these retirement savers ill-prepared even further for such a vital need for peoples future. In my opinion you will create another generation even more dependent on the government for their retirement.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jeff Burtis
East Peoria, IL
jeff@jeffburtis.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Bhavesh Patel
Whitehall, PA
bpatel@ft.newyorklife.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Bobby Layman
Maitland, FL
blayman@cfl.rr.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

George C. Grow
Washington, NJ
georgegrowll@yahoo.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Daniel Willie
Austin, TX
daniel.willie@northstarfinancial.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Mickey Ray
Midland, TX
mlray@financialguide.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Grant Foster CLU
Austin, TX
gfoster@fosterfinancial.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Rosann Rabozzi
boca raton, FL
ro@rabozzi.com

07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

I would like to point out that I have one specific client with over 20 employees on his SEP Plan. At this point I am able to help advise him in regards to funds he invests in. I am able to guide his employees as well. This new regulation would hinder the process to help all of his qualified employees. Please review and rescind this regulation.

Manuel Esparza Jr
Alice, TX
manuelesparzajr@email.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Michael Calafati
Harleysville, PA
mcalafati@hotmail.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Ursula Madlaing
San Jose, CA
utmadlaing@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

David Harjoe
Creve Coeur, MO
david@harjoe.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you, especially if you have been working towards workable solutions thus far.

Robert Newman
West Chester, PA
rana17@verizon.net
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA). Furthermore, I can be second guessed at any time. For example I suggest that the client buy a fixed annuity paying 2% because of the company's strength. Later I could be sued because there was another company that paid 3%. Anybody remember Executive Life, Liberty Mutual? Their annuities paid substantially higher rates than other carriers and when they went under annuity customers lost (all life claims were paid but the policies were revised and the cash values were not the same as originally purchased)

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Patricia Diaz
San Joe, CA
pdiaz02@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Charlie Merrill
Arlington, TX
jmerrill@fscadviaor.com

07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Sri Jonnada
Oklahoma City, OK
sjonnada@ft.nyl.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kelli Smith
SHREVEPORT, LA
kelli.smith.twve@statefarm.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Gina Estrada
Clovis, CA
gina.estrada@axa-advisors.com

07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Kenneth Head
Greenville, SC
ken@headfinancial.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Richard Durnwald
Fort Myers, FL
rich.durnwald@nm.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Elaine J. Fremling CLU
West Fargo, ND
elaine.fremling@nm.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I have a huge concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. I have been a professional in financial services for 38 years. My experience is that people need guidance and I see that the rule that will have the unintended consequences of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services due the requirements and costs.

I have worked with the middle market of individuals and small business all my career. Specifically, my clients in the early stages of retirement savings did not have the financial wealth to pay me a large fee for my services. Rather, as many began their savings for retirement with very small amounts, $25.00 to $50.00 per month, a fee would have been out of the question. Rather, through them being aware that I received a very small commission from each of their saved amounts, together, we met their goals of a comfortable retirement income that they would not outlive.

Today, many of my retired clients review their plans each year before they head off to their winter location and return the next summer not having spent all that was generated. They say things to me such as, "Don't you die until your 150. We need you around to know we are still doing ok." They appreciate that I am a constant in their life, that I know what I am doing, and, frankly, they don't care that they paid me a commission as we grew their net worth so they could live the lifestyle that they desired in retirement.

My small business clients in this same middle market also need my advise and guidance without another layering of fees. Most small business people want to do the right thing by their employees by providing a retirement savings tool such as a 401(k). They rarely have a highly qualified human resources director on their payroll. Thus, they need help on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The fees that they pay for such a plan are already high. A full service outside plan administrator is a must, and then there are the tax filing requirements that all are a cost.

Frankly, employees from the middle market will leave all their monies in a 401(k) plan in a cash account without someone guiding them to a proper asset allocation based on their time horizon, comfort level for risk and growth. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement in addition to the above mentioned costs. When the cost gets to high, the employer is forced to not maintain a plan at all. Such an action has to opposite effect to that which is desired with the DOL rule. Another unintended consequence.

Another example, is where I have clients who have worked for a terminated business and were forced to move their retirement plan to an IRA. Others, may have found themselves out of work due to downsizing, are suspect of that former employer and do not want to leave their retirement assets with that employer and instead move it to an IRA. Finally, as a part of a comprehensive plan, people often need an option for their retirement assets that were not made available through a company retirement plan and an IRA rollover was their best choice. Again, our services, even on a commission base arrangement was their best option. From the examples above, how does an unemployed worker take money from their emergency fund to pay for a fee based financial planner for a large dollar amount, or worse yet have no savings to pay the fee when their whole future is in question? Answer - they wont. Instead they may withdraw their money, pay tax and a penalty, and now be much further behind on achieving financial independence in retirement. All which could have been prevented, had they had our advice, even for a commission. Another unintended consequence.

Finally, one of the scariest times in one's life is transitioning to retirement where there is no longer income, but rather, all outgo, people need help in their distribution options. Again, because it is another of those unknown points in life, they do not like writing big checks. Instead, many are trying to cut back on expenses yet they still need guidance. They need what we on a commission base can provide in terms of payment plan choices, and asset allocation of remaining balances to keep up with inflation. Without it they will move to cash, draw down on it, running out of money before they run out of time and not be prepared for the last big risk in life - long term care. Another unintended consequence.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted.

Without the DOL providing an exemption to accommodate third party compensation most of middle America will go under served, and lower income people like even my daughter will not have to help to get started saving their way to a living income in retirement.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American savers and retirees achieve and maintain a secure retirement.

Ben Parish
San Luis Obispo, CA
bentparish@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Richard Rios
folsom, CA
drios@riososj.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Edmond Bradberry
Tallahassee, FL
edmond_bradberry@glic.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Mark Buller
Ville Platte, LA
mbuller@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Sydney Gomez
Windermere, FL
sydgomez13@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Example: I recently helped an individual decide what to do with their 401(k) account when they separated from service from their employer. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was their best choice.

I helped them decide how to invest the IRA to best fit their personal financial situation, their risk tolerance, investment objectives, tax status and liquidity needs.

I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. If I didn't help this person, the likely result would have been a cash out premature distribution which results in tax implications and early withdrawal penalties. Each person has their own unique situation that requires guidance.

Everett Harding
Pensacola, FL
scott.harding@nm.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Mike Pearce
Orlando, FL
mpearce218@aol.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Camelia Petit
Jupiter, FL
cameliapetit@bellsouth.net
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Michael Ables
Nipomo, CA
mjables@sbcglobal.net
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kevin Brand
Dallas, TX
kbrand@financialguide.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Pete Newman
Bellville, TX
pnewman@germaniainsurance.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Due to the current administration's policies, I found myself, again, talking with another laid-off energy services sector tax payer that is confused about their rights and obligations regarding the rollover of their 401(k). I had tremendous empathy for this 61 year old man. I spent considerable time speaking with him and reviewing his wide variety of options. I am confident that the rule now proposed would make it more difficult for this man to gather information and make a thoughtful informed decision.

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Janak Zalawadia
cedar park, TX
janak.zalawadia@mwarep.org
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Ron Schutz
Houston, TX
schutzrp@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for many dozen years know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients nor routinely refer me to their friends and co workers.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow independent advisors positively impact lives.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Joseph Andrade
Katy, TX
joseph.andrade.do7v@statefarm.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

mark byron morristown, NJ
mark-bobbie@att.net
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Steve Heinen
Fort Worth, TX
championsins@aol.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Michael Savino
Mahwah, NJ
msavino@cfsllc.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Mark Anderson
Gilbert, AZ
mark.anderson.sugm@statefarm.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Marci Reece CLU ChFC
Littleton, CO
marci@reeceagency.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jathan McDowell
Hurst, TX
jathan.mcdowell.qcbi@statefarm.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Brad Campbell
rockwall, TX
brad.campbell.cblz@statefarm.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Mike Behl
Tampa, FL
mbehl@tampabay.rr.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Vickie Ford
Tulsa, OK
vlford@ft.nyl.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Anna Bodine
Austin, TX
anna.bodine@raymondjames.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Tim Yeager
quitman, TX
tyeager@txfb-ins.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Cort Otterbein
Birmingham, MI
cort@financialarch.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

David Tolson
Houston, TX
davidtolson22@yahoo.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Kent Wooliscroft
Abilene, TX
kwooliscroft@farmersagent.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Joseph Pond
Salt Lake City, UT
jpond@sfp.us

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Robert Keorkunian
Kalamazoo, MI
robert.j.keorkunian@mwarep.org
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Steve Schildt
Janesville, WI
steve.schildt@nm.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Richard Rose
Greensboro, NC
rerose@financialguide.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Timothy Foley
Chicago, IL
timfoley78@yahoo.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kenneth Broman
LINCOLN, NE
ken@fiqadvisors.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Joel Blomberg
jacksonville,, FL
joel.blomberg@prudential.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Michelle Zaman
Springfield, VA
mzaman84@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I am concerned that the DOL Fiduciary rule as currently written would have an adverse impact on the investment education I currently receive and limit the advice on plan withdrawals or rollovers if I changed jobs. Under the proposed rule, advisors' discussion with clients would be limited to generic explanations of products unless their clients agree to pay a costly fee, or sign a Best Interest Contract. The DOL needs to broaden the education exemption.

Many consumers need help rolling over their 401k or other retirement plan to another one that's right for them. This could change under the DOL rule because advisors who work under commission would have to charge a costly fee for the same service. And when I'm ready to retire - I would have to figure out the plan's complicated withdrawal options all on my own. The DOL should clarify the language of the Best Interest Contract so it includes advice on distribution and rollovers.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

D. Taft Hall
Cincinnati, OH
thinsure1@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

William Moore
LaGrange, GA
wrmoore1@bellsouth.net
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Joseph Baines
Atlanta, GA
peter.baines@nm.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Teresa Baker
Tucson, AZ
lapalomabadger@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Joanne Natale
Perkasie, PA
joanne_natale@glic.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Lincoln Collins
Greenbrae, CA
lcollins@wealthvest.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Celine Pastore
Palm Harbor, FL
celinep@me.com

07/20/2015

Re: A Fiduciary's Take on Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm sure you've received many canned responses to this but I would like to share with you my personal take on it:

My opposition to to this complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. I already am a "fiduciary" as an Investment Advisor, but also offer commissioned insurance products which my clients need for a secure, well rounded retirement.

For me personally, I think to best protect the public without throwing the baby out with the bath water as we did with Obama Care (and HIPPA for that matter), and literally risk putting thousands of small business agents out of business, I think this discussion should be more about disclosure and less about regulation.

In a real estate transaction a buyer knows who the agent represents and it is fully disclosed (with one form and one signature). The buyers can then make an informed decision on whether there is any "bias" in their agents recommendations because they know how they are getting paid and who they are representing. It doesn't require legal contracts that the buyer can then come back and sue the agent if they ended up in a neighborhood that was not what they expected (notice I said "expected" and not what they were told). People often change their minds or think a deal was not good after the fact, when at the time it may have been exactly what they asked for or the best deal for what they could afford or qualify for.

As I mentioned earlier, I am a fiduciary that works in the clients best interest and there are plenty of us in the market place and clients and companies are free to shop the market and decide for themselves (like free enterprise is supposed to work).

I think that if we simply increase disclosure by requiring all agents to disclose how they get paid and any potential or real conflicts of interest and then allow the public to decide for themselves, then that is a truly free enterprise system and the public will dictate how they prefer to do business. So rather than the government tell us, why don't we allow the consumer to make that decision?

This rule needs to be rewritten and simplified to require more disclosure and not more regulation!

Chad Monson
Phoenix, AZ
chad.monson@centralfinancialgroup.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Van Ewing II
Chicago, IL
van.ewing@hunckenfinancial.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Juan Cosio
Miami, FL
juanlcosio@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Alex Bunkers
Maitland, FL
alex@fbplans.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Steven Powell
Bettendorf, IA
steve@powellfinancialgroup.net
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kathie Redel
Jefferson City, MO
kredel@naught-naught.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Reagan Wolfe
Atlanta, GA
reaganwolfe@ashfordadvisors.net
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

This email may look familiar, because you probably have received it from mothers. But have no doubt, this is exactly how I feel. Please take these emails very, very seriously...

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Kurt W Kushner CFP(R)
Archbald, PA
kushnek@nationwide.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

LISA DILTS
HAUGHTON, LA
lisa@diltsinsurance.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Larry Gibson
Columbia, MO
lgibson@naught-naught.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Zachary Lucas
Toledo, OH
zachary.lucas@savageandassociates.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Victor Brenes
Miami, FL
vbrenes@financialguide.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Robert Rosenthal
Tamarac, FL
robert@therosenthalagency.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Russ Ramsey
Rochester, IL
russ.ramsey.quib@statefarm.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Nicholas J. Zec Jr. LUTCF, CFS
Bradenton, FL
nickz@boydinsurance.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I work exclusively with Small Business Employers and their employees in the State of Florida.. This potential Fiduciary Rule change hurts me and my clients significantly. I am just a main street advisor helping smaller clients who have limited access to long term professionals like myself. I have done this now for over 34 years and feel compelled to again tell you that this is an overreach of regulation by our Government. Almost all of us were appalled by the Movie " The Wolf of Wall Street" Do not let a few bad apples ruin it for the rest of the good advisors and the lower paid and hard working people of America. What I do is very valuable ,and I feel it is wrong to include people like me in the same breath as the bad guys whom you are trying to protect all Americans against. I have no violations on my record and FINRA does a good job of making sure that we are monitored. This is just more of the same.

I'm writing to seriously express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Beth Anne Naugher
metairie, LA
beth@banaugher.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Santiago Rodriguez
Bradley, IL
santiago.rodriguez@countryfinancial.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Randolph Deveaux
DeLand, FL
leftfield42r@yahoo.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jenny Louie
floral park, NY
seonsimlouie@ft.newyorklife.com

07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Dana Stein
Minneapolis, MN
dstein@steinfg.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Courtney Bender
Metairie, LA
courtney@noraholmes.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jim Coviello
W, NC
jimcoviello@hotmail.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Nate Crowther
Draper, UT
ncrowther@sfp.us
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Dennis Morris
Shawnee, OK
denandgwen@aol.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Troy DeLair
North Ogden, UT
troy@rfam4.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Rita DeMarko Utica, NY
rdemarko@nbtbank.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Kevin Faherty
Fort Worth, TX
kfaherty@hotmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Timothy Allen
San Antonio, TX
timc_a@hotmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Brian Keane
Manchester, NH
bkeane@ft.newyorklife.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Cecilia Carlton
Brandon, MS
chc1039@aol.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Joseph Dennis
Gainesville, GA
joe.dennis@nm.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Scott Allison
Loudonville, OH
scottie.allison@yahoo.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Michael Mandrell
Decatur, IL
mike@mikemandrell.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

John Conley
Newton, MA
jconley@rubinoandliang.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Ken Stamey
Woodland, CA
kenstamey@aol.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Ralph Sabbagh
Roseville, CA
rsabbagh@pacificadvisors.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

THOMAS E. MCGLOTHLEN

EDELSTEIN, IL

tmacsail@gmail.com

07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Zachry Young
Atlanta, GA
z.young@nm.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Chris Shelton
Yarmouth, ME
casatlanticgroup@gmail.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I am a retirement advisor that has been in the industry for 17 years.

As written, the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice does the opposite of it's stated intent: it has an EXTREMELY negative impact on American retirees, in that it significantly limits their access to both individualized advisory services and retirement strategies.

This proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. There are already a phalanx of consumer protection laws and regulations in place, AS WELL AS strict industry guidelines. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind.

I recently assisted a client with a decision on what to do with his 401(a) account when he retired from his position. The decision was made that rolling his assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for him. I helped him with options that were the best possible solution for his risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, and liquidity needs. I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds and an annuity. Under the current proposal of the rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. Without the services of an advisor such as myself, my client would likely have just cashed out his 401(a) to get it out of the market. As a result he would have been subject to the taxes of the withdrawal, rather than insuring that his retirement account would meet his specific needs.

The proposal is also harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please rewrite this terribly unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Dennis Merideth
Tucson, AZ
dmerideth@metibp.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

John McCauley
Oxford, MS
jmike@mccauleyagency.net
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Roberta Bar-Levav
New York, NY
rbarlevav@ft.newyorklife.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Sonya Y.
Lithonia, GA
syyoung@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

David Christy
Spokane, WA
dwchristy1@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Good Morning:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure. Our company and my office specialize in helping the middle market of America which is ignored by almost every other company.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Jeffrey Thomas Keizer, OR
thomasjc@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

John Enright
Baldwinsville, NY
john.enright@lfg.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Shabonya Dutton
Elko, NV
shabonya.dutton.mo6a@statefarm.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Recently, I helped Paul decide what to do with his 401(k) account when he terminated employment. The decision was made that rolling the assets into an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) was the best choice for Paul. I helped Paul decide how to invest the IRA account to best meet Paul's risk tolerance, financial situation, tax status, investment objectives, liquidity needs, and risk tolerance. I received commissions from the purchase of mutual funds and an annuity. Under the current rule, I would be prohibited from providing any of those services. The likely result would be that Paul would instead just cash out his 401(k) and would suffer the tax and the early withdrawal penalty, a wrong decision but one likely if he hadn't had access to my services.

kim nuelle
Downingtown, PA
kim.r.nuelle.gsc5@statefarm.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Robin Jones
Tonganoxie, KS
robin.jones@fbfs.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Matt Tasse
Portland, ME
mtasse@scribnerinsurance.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Kyle Angelle
Pearland, TX
kyle@kyleangelle.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Kyle Lindner
Katy, TX
kyle@insurewithkyle.net
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Larry Reelitz
West Des Moines, IA
reelitz.larry@principal.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Craig Forbes
White Plains, NY
craig2.forbes@prudential.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Larnce Hicks
Oklahoma City, OK
larnce.hicks@gmail.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Larry Lambert
Santa Ana, CA
larryl@lblgroup.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Nancy Van De Berg
Luverne, MN
nancy.vandenberg@investfinancial.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Jim Garrison
Topeka, KS
jim@jimgarrison.biz
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. Most of my clients are true middle Americans that would not have access to "Wall Street" brokerage firms. Many individuals that we help with retirement needs have been our clients for numerous years. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

charles Hemelt III aberdeen, MD
cfhemelt@aol.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

jDear Senator Cardin, Dutch Ruppertsberger,

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Chris Pennell
Los Angeles, CA
cpennell@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Claudia Escamilla
katy, TX
claudia.n.escamilla.d24u@statefarm.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Nina Graham
Metairie, LA
nina@noraholmes.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Joe Hodges
MEDINA, OH
finalexpenseplan@yahoo.com
07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) cannot be operationalized as currently drafted. A new exemption (that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees) is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.

ERISA does not permit investment advice fiduciaries to have conflicts of interest, yet 98% of all IRA accounts are served under a commission model that the DOL considers to be conflicted. Therefore, the DOL must provide an exemption to accommodate third party compensation.

The new BIC exemption requires a contract between the advisor, the financial institution and the retirement saver. Under the rule, the contract must be executed before any recommendations are made, which is simply unworkable. Retirement savers will be intimidated by the need to sign a legal document before deciding any course of action, and financial institutions will be reluctant to be a party to the contract before having any oversight or client profile.

The contract increases the legal liability and exposure of the advisor and institution and increases the costs of doing business as a result.

The BIC exemption also requires the institution to maintain a public website with copious amounts of data and information and in a format that may be impossible to accomplish.

The DOL must simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client

circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

Thank you for the opportunity to share my concerns. I urge the Department to make these necessary changes to achieve the goal of helping American retirees achieve a secure retirement.

Frank S Dunaway, III, CLU
Carthage, MO
fsdunaway@swbell.net
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Mary Anne Cannady
Walterboro, SC
cana@lowcountry.com

07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Jereme Hartman
North Platte, NE
jereme.hartman@edwardjones.com
07/20/2015

Re: Labor's Proposed Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

The Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule for retirement investment advice is unworkable. The proposal would confuse investors, increase costs, harm advisor-client relationships and interfere with the ability of advisors to serve retirement investors.

My opposition to provisions in a complex regulation does not mean I'm against the concept of putting my clients first. My clients, many of whom I have worked with for a dozen years or more, know that I have their best interests in mind. Otherwise, they would no longer be my clients.

The proposal is harmful to low balance savers. It limits third party compensation for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or other qualified plans. The DOL needs to resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

As written the rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement. The DOL should permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.

Savers and retirees need more, not less, investment education. However, Investment education is narrowly defined which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations. The DOL should broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

The Best Interest Contract Exemption is inoperable. The new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, is complicated, confusing to consumers and costly. I urge DOL to simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

The proposal does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options. The BIC exemption language needs to be clarified to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

Please re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice. As written, the rule significantly limits American retirees' access to individualized guidance and to lifetime income guarantees.

Michael Moore
Springfield, MO
mmoore1164@hotmail.com

07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Sanjay Malik
lake success, NY
smalik01@ft.newyorklife.com
07/20/2015

Re: DOL Fiduciary Rule (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

Thank you for seeking practical input on how to develop a best interest standard. I'm concerned that the current proposal is unworkable. The proposal contains provisions that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

American investors need reliable education, affordable retirement advice and clear and easily understood disclosure.

Unfortunately, the current draft:

- Prohibits an advisor from providing advice to plan sponsors under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee-for-service arrangement.
- Narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.
- Does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.
- Creates an inoperable Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC) - a new exemption that would allow otherwise prohibited compensation such as commissions and 12b-1 fees, but is complicated, confusing to consumers, costly and in some respects, impossible to comply with.
- Limits third party for variable annuities and fixed annuities with different rules depending upon whether in an IRA or in other qualified plans.

In order to make the proposal workable for savers and retirees, I urge the Department to make the following changes:

- Permit third party compensation models when working with businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans.
- Broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and consumers must be able to discuss together specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

- Clarify BIC exemption language to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

- Simplify the contract requirements and eliminate the burdensome data retention and cumulative disclosure requirements. The contract should be executable once a full review of the client's circumstances, goals, objectives and financial options has been discussed and a decision has been made as to a course of action.

- Resolve the conflict between the rules in its BIC PTE proposal and SEC/FINRA rules, address the parties-in-interest/self-dealing rule issues that particularly impact fixed and variable annuities, explicitly allow proprietary products, and captive as compared to independent advisors.

I urge the Department of Labor to re-write this unworkable rule to achieve our mutual goal of an effective best interest standard that will retain access to affordable professional advice.

Diane Shemi
Petaluma, CA
dianeshemi@hotmail.com

07/20/2015

Re: Department of Labor (RIN 1210-AB32)

Dear Secretary Perez:

I'm writing to express my concern with the Department of Labor's proposed fiduciary rule. While I support the Department's goal, the fiduciary proposal is complicated, costly and difficult, if not impossible, to operationalize. There are many provisions in the rule that will have the unintended consequence of leaving many retirement savers without access to professional education, advice and services.

Employers need advice on the design and investment options of their retirement plans. The DOL rule prohibits an advisor from providing advice under a commission arrangement - meaning that the employer must pay using a fee for services arrangement.

Businesses that sponsor retirement savings plans often rely on advisors to help implement the plan, design plan features such as auto enrollment to encourage employees to participate in the plan, as well as assistance in selecting the investment options available to participants. Affordability is a crucial issue, especially for small plans.

The DOL specifically prohibits advisors from being paid via commissions, 12b-1 fees or other fee-sharing when advising employers on their plan provisions. The DOL should revise the final rule to permit third party compensation models when working with businesses who sponsor retirement savings plans.

Employees need to be educated on the importance of saving early for retirement, on determining their risk tolerance and what investment options are available in their work-place retirement plan. The DOL proposal narrowly defines investment education, which will limit the assistance advisors can provide without triggering fiduciary obligations.

The proposed rule does not allow an advisor to identify specific investments, even as an example of the type or class of investment that meet the employee's retirement objectives. As such, the rule transforms true education into fiduciary advice so early in the process that it would reduce access to necessary educational information, and likely result in less savings and riskier choices.

The DOL must broaden the education provision, especially with respect to the timing of an advice conversation proceeding to the mention of specific investment products. Advisors and their clients/prospects must be able to discuss specific investment choices prior to the point at which a recommendation is made and a specific choice is contemplated.

Employees need advice when rolling or transferring plan assets to another plan or to an IRA, as well as advice on taking distributions from their plan in retirement. The DOL rule, as currently drafted, does not allow advisors to receive third party compensation when advising plan participants on distribution options.

The DOL proposed new prohibited transaction exemption, called the Best Interest Contract Exemption (BIC), allows an advisor to receive third party compensation if certain conditions are met, including that the advisor and his/her financial institution (e.g., broker-dealer, insurance company, and bank) must enter into a contract with specific provisions. However, the rule, as drafted, does not include advice on plan distributions or roll-overs to individual retirement arrangements (IRA).

Only half of 401(k) plans have systematic withdrawal provisions, and only 15% have an annuity to provide guaranteed lifetime income as an investment choice, necessitating the employee roll the plan assets to an IRA, where an annuity can be purchased. It is less expensive for the advisor to be paid a commission in this circumstance than to pay an on-going asset management fee.

The DOL must clarify the language of the BIC exemption to encompass advice on plan distributions and rollovers. It must be clear that advice in these situations can be compensated by commissions, 12b-1 fees, and fee sharing if the terms of the BIC exemption are satisfied.

